to employ a lawyer to prosecute. Do you reckon he would take the trouble, would he be mean enough, unwise enough, to hire a lawyer to prosecute the claim for these Indians unless he thought there was something in it?

Mr. TELLER. I decline to go into the question as to what the Secretary of the Interior might do or what he might not do. I am going to deal with the facts, not with suppositions, as does the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado is indulging in some suppositions.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. The Senator may know all about it, but I contend that it is more decent and more in accord with justice that the court should determine it than that the Senate should do it.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator would wait, if he would be patient until I could make a statement, he would see that he does not know anything about this case. Nor does he know anything about the law that applies to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know a little something about justice, though.

Mr. TELLER. I hope he does. But he is not asking justice now.

Now, what are the facts? The Government appointed a man to go down there and pay out this money. That was perfectly proper. Mr. Jenkins is a man against whom I have never heard anything alleged, and I will venture to say nobody has ever alleged anything anywhere, not even in a letter from an unknown correspondent of the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not heard a word about Jenkins, but Brown is being sued.

Mr. TELLER. Brown is treasurer of the Seminole tribe. He is a man of as high character as any man in that section of the country. Nobody will deny that he is. Mr. Brown gave a bond. The Government exacted, before allowing the money to go into his hands, a bond of $400,000 for the proper payment of this money. I say $400,000. It was either three hundred of four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DUBOIS. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Idaho says $300,000. It was much more money than he was receiving, because he received only the money that belonged to the minor heirs of these Seminole soldiers. Mr. Brown technically may be in bad shape. The judge of the probate court that had to pass upon Brown's acts in paying the money over to the Indian minors, instead of ratifying them in open court, ratified them in chambers. If the judge had been sitting on the bench there would have been no question about the propriety of it. Nobody has yet charged that Mr. Brown misappropriated the money, but it is claimed—and that is the ground upon which the suit is brought—that technically he did not have the approval of his acts, because the court acted in chambers and not in court. It was a probate judge, as we would say in my State and in most of the States. But I will venture to say that 90 per cent of those things are done in chambers, and with every other tribe except the Seminoles under the Arkansas law it could have been done in chambers.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is a great lawyer, and I am not anything but a common, ordinary man, but if his objection to Mr. Brown being sued—for that must be the basis of this action—is that it rests on mere technicality, why should Mr. Brown object to being sued when the technicality would relieve him as soon as it was demonstrated to the satisfaction of the court that it was a mere omission of some little official etiquette or provision of law? If there is not down under this something else indicating dishonesty or something else, why should Brown object to being sued?

Mr. TELLER. I have never had a word from Mr. Brown in my life. I expect before the Senator gets through he will charge me with desiring to steal something.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator does not expect anything of the sort. I contradict him flatly.

Mr. TELLER. It would be just as appropriate for him to do that as to charge Mr. Brown with peculation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Brown is already being sued to recover what it is alleged he misappropriated.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will let me get through, he may take all the afternoon if he desires.

Mr. Brown paid out the money. He paid some of it to these attorneys. That is one of the objections that is made. He paid it to them under their contract. He was holding this money for citizens of the United States and not the Indians. Can any lawyer here or anywhere else tell me that the Secretary of the Interior or any other officer is doing anything more than to pay the money to the men who are entitled to it? When he paid it, that was the end of it. They are not now suing Brown because he did not pay the money. They are suing Brown because a certain character down there thought there was a technicality and that Brown could be compelled to pay the second time, and he went to work and got up these suits.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States has brought no suit against this man. The Government would not stand an hour in court if it brought the suit. Two hundred and eleven suits have been brought against Mr. Brown, that being the number of cases in which he had to pay to the heirs of soldiers as the guardian appointed by the court. His conduct was approved by the judge, but it ought to have been approved by the court.

I wish to say that everybody then supposed that the law of Arkansas which was in force as to every other tribe and which had been adopted applied to the Seminoles. It was found that it did not apply to the Seminoles. If he had paid this money under like circumstances to the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, or any other Indians except the Seminoles, under the Arkansas law which had been adopted down there for the other tribes it would have been an absolute payment, and there never would have been a word heard about it.

Now, Mr. President, a man who I will say is not of good character brought these suits. They are speculative suits. If he can get from Mr. Brown money of this kind, he will recover something. The amendment leaves the right of every man there to prosecute this man if he wants to. We hold Mr. Brown's bond, and, so far as the Government is concerned, he will be relieved from the interference of the United States. The United States had a right when they paid money into his hands to ask him to give bond that he would pay it out, and if he has not paid it out properly, they can sue him on his bond.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that the whole effect of this proposed legislation?

Mr. TELLER. That is the whole effect of it. Here is a provision that leaves to every man a right to sue, and leaves every suit that is brought in the name of the individual still pending.

I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he may know more about this than the committee that had it under examination for some time, and he may think that he is more anxious to protect the rights of the Indians than the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Mr. President, I do not believe he is either better acquainted with the facts or that he has any more anxiety and zeal to do the right thing with the Indians than we have. They are not Indians under the law; they are white men; and we could not take away their right to bring suit if we should try. If in this bill there was a provision that those men should not bring a suit, we would have no authority to enact it. They are citizens. As I said the other day, they have now every right that the best, the wisest, and the greatest in this land have; and we have not attempted to do anything, except to say that, so far as the Government is concerned, it will not interfere with Mr. Brown. Beyond that we have not taken a single step nor made a single movement. Every right these Indians have now by law they will have. We have not attempted to take away their right; and if we should, it would be a useless effort on our part.

Mr. President, we have had a good deal of trouble with this bill. We have done the best we could with it. I will venture to say that in the whole history of legislation here no committee has ever been perplexed with such difficult and unsatisfactory conditions as has the Committee on Indian Affairs on this bill. I do not know now, nor does any other man, and the Senator from South Carolina is not wise enough to find out for us, or even for himself, what may be the effect of the condition down there, and what may be and what properly should be the law as to their property. With that we have done the best it was possible for us to do. We sat hours and days considering how we could handle this question, to preserve to them all that belonged to them. If we have not done it, it is because we have been incapable of doing it after all the labor and effort that we have given it.

This conference report, Mr. President, does not suit me, but I know that there must be an end to this controversy. This bill is needed, and the Indians will suffer immensely more than any other part of the people if the bill does not speedily become a law. We had to extend the tribal relation to protect them. We have done everything we could; and, Mr. President, it does not come with good grace from a Senator here, who knows nothing about the facts, to practically array this committee as being engaged in an attempt to commit a crime against the Indians, or to deprive them of an opportunity to pursue their case, if they have got one, in the courts of the country. If the Senator was anything more than, as he says, "a cornfield lawyer," he would know, and if he was a real good cornfield lawyer, he would know to-day that no man living and no power on the face of the earth can take away from them the rights of citizenship that we have given them, and which they have assumed, some of them for more than five years past.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, personally I was in a good deal of doubt as to the merits of this amendment. Perhaps if it had been left to my own volition I would have rejected it as an initiative, and practically I so stated the other day. But the Senate adopted this amendment. It strikes me that it would have been too late to recede from it even the day we had the report up last week, but, if not, the Senator from South Carolina last night had the same opportunity before the other report was formerly withdrawn that he would have had the afternoon it was before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood that the report was withdrawn last night. Was the report which we are now discussing presented yesterday?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; the Chair held yesterday that the original report had not been withdrawn. Am I correct, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to know, if that report was not withdrawn and was in the possession of the Senate, how did this committee of conference get hold of it to go out and agree to a new one?

Mr. CLAPP. Because, when the report first came in, the point of order being made by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] and urged by some of the senior Senators, the chairman of the committee of conference recognized that the point of order was well taken, that practically, for all practical purposes——

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, if the Senator will wait a moment—that practically disposed of the matter. But in order to get the view of the Senate on some of the questions involved, the matter was left before the Senate for consideration. The day the debate closed on it, April 3, the Senator from South Carolina called the attention of the chairman of the conference committee to his objection to this section 9, and when we reached that the chairman of the conference committee stated:

> The Senator from South Carolina has called attention to section 9, where the Senate amendment was concurred in. I think the Senator is quite correct, and, so far as the chairman is concerned, it will be the sense of the conferees to strike that out in conference.

That is the statement which was made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. And in justice to the conferees of the Senate, I will state that they stood by him when it came to conference; but when we reached the conference, the House conferees having the right to accede, it was beyond the power of the Senate conferees to withdraw the amendment which the Senate had placed in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has opened up a brand new phase, which I want settled before we go any further, and that is this: If the original conference report made here last week, and the substance of which is in Senate Document 269, was before the Senate yesterday evening and only withdrawn formally after the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I want to know when and by what authority the conferees agreed to Document 307, which is now before the Senate. If the conferees have taken the responsibility on themselves to go out and call the House conferees together to consider a matter which was in the possession of the Senate, which had not been returned to the possession of the Senate conferees, I want to know how that comes about. I should like to have the Chair's ruling on that, for here is the report printed yesterday, obtained by me yesterday afternoon, announcing the agreement that has been made in a new conference; when, under the ruling of the Chair, the old conference was on his table and out of the jurisdiction of the Senate conferees.

Mr. CLAPP. Whatever may be the consequences——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want the Chair's ruling, if the Senator will please allow me to get it, as to whether or not there is any conference report before the Senate now.

Mr. CLAPP. There is not any question——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a conference report before the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly there is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Chair please rule how it got here?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report was submitted by the conferees on the part of the Senate last evening.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the new conference report, if the Chair will pardon me, was submitted before the old one was withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; the conference report was submitted after the old conference report was formally withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. Formally withdrawn; but I am speaking now about the technicality. My honorable friend from Colorado has made a great point upon me this morning about technicalities. I want to stand by the technicalities of the rule of the Senate, and I want the Chair to rule on it. Can the conferees of the Senate go ahead and consider matters in controversy between the two Houses when the conference report which they submitted last week is still in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina, who seems to think that he is losing some opportunity. If there is anything offensive in the view of the Senate in the present conference report with reference to this amendment, it is just as open to the Senator from South Carolina to attack it as it was before. It has been agreed to by the conferees of the two Houses. It could not be taken out or modified or changed in any way without the consent of the other members of the conference committee.

Now, if the Senator thinks he can get a vote of the Senate and vote it out, he can do it just as well now as then. The truth is he can not do that under the rule. All we can do is to reject this report. We can not in this body even instruct the conference to take it out. We can say we will not adopt it, and it goes back to the committee of conference; and if they return it again in some shape it is here again, and so again. If the Senator can show that this is not a proper provision, he has not been deprived by anything the conference committee has done of any of his rights, as I understand the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado either purposely misunderstands me or else we can not see the thing in the same light. I want the ruling of the Chair as to the status of the report which was here last week and five minutes before we adjourned yesterday, when the Senator was trying to get this report up and formally withdrew the conference report which had been submitted last week. At the same time, and before that, a report is presented, treating on the same subject, showing that the conferees have considered it, notwithstanding it was in our possession and had not been acted upon. I contend that under the rules of the Senate the conferees had no authority whatever to touch this report until it was formally withdrawn last night. And yet we have it here that they not only have proceeded to consider it, and agreed to this proposition in the amendment numbered 24, but came in and submitted the new report before they got the old one out of the possession of the Senate. I want to know how that hocus-pocus was brought about.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has just stated that this new report was presented before the other report was withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Chair if the RECORD shows that to be the case?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The RECORD does not show it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator stated that it was presented before the other one was withdrawn. All Senators heard him make that statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said it had been acted upon by the conferees, and I contend that they acted without any authority, because the report was in the possession of the Senate, lying on the desk of the Vice-President, and the conferees had no more jurisdiction over it than I had. That is my contention.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, Mr. President, the Senator stated that the report was presented before the other report was withdrawn. Those were the words that were used by the Senator. I heard them, and that is the reason why I wanted the know whether the facts disclose such to be the case. As I understand the rule, we could not necessarily do anything further with that case so long as it was in the hands of the Senate, but before the new report was made the other report was withdrawn. It does not seem to me to make any difference whether the committee considered it a few minutes before and were ready to make their report five minutes or one minute or five hours afterwards. It complies with the law and the rules if it was presented to the Senate after the other report was withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the stenographer, with the consent of the Senate, read what I said.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know whether any Senator is now prepared to discuss the unfinished business or not. I should like to hear from anyone who wants to speak before I take any action in regard to the matter.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina as to what he knows as to the desire of other Senators to address the Senate in reference to the pending bill. I want to speak briefly in support of some amendments which I have offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Ohio wish to go on now?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not expect to go on now. I thought some Senator would speak at 2 o'clock. That is what some one told me.

Mr. TILLMAN. No Senator has indicated to me any desire to speak to-day. I have had notice from the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that he wants to speak next Tuesday. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] expected to speak to-day, but he is unwell. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] has indicated that he wants to speak to-morrow, but I do not know of anyone who wants to go on now. I should be glad if the Senator from Ohio would proceed, if he feels like it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose when the Senator alludes to the Senator from Wisconsin he means the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] expects to speak to-morrow morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood that he would speak to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I would suggest——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest that the unfinished business might be laid aside temporarily, and if later it appears that some Senator wishes to speak to-day it can be resumed.

Mr. TILLMAN. While we have got it up I will suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island, and I simply make the inquiry in view of the lagging character of the debate and the indication that very few Senators are prepared to make speeches or seem to desire to make them, whether he can suggest a time when we might get a vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am greatly surprised that the Senator from South Carolina should allude to this debate in the manner he does. I have never in my experience in the Senate known a debate on a great question that was so well sustained and so continuous as this debate has been, and I am greatly——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will pardon my inexperience. I have not heretofore been charged with caring for any babies or furnishing rations for them every day, and this one seems to be begging.

Mr. ALDRICH. Occasionally, but not very often; and I think the Senator perhaps ought to be forgiven in view of his inexperience.

Mr. FORAKER. There are a great number of Senators who want to address the Senate, some of whom have not spoken at all, as I am told, and some who have addressed the Senate want to speak again as to certain amendments which they desire to offer. I wish to speak only as to certain amendments. The Senator is familiar with the amendment I want to offer to the bill. I have been under the impression that I ought to delay doing that until the Senators who want to make regular speeches are through with their general discussion of the subject. I would have been prepared to go on at this moment, and I can go on if that is desired. I will do so rather than have it go out that we have allowed the country unnecessarily to suffer from the outrages that are being cured by this measure.

But if there is a matter under consideration now, the matter in charge of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], I can yield until we get through with it. I just came into the Chamber as the unfinished business was being laid before the Senate. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to continue with the conference report it will be entirely agreeable to me to wait until he gets through, if that is only a reasonable time, as I assume it will be. Then we can take up this bill and I can go on with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no desire, and I hope Senators have not felt that I have been endeavoring to press this matter unduly. As I said, I am inexperienced in this sort of thing, the great responsibility resting upon me, and the suggestion of some of my older friends on the other side that I ought not to let the debate lag has caused me to press it as much as I have done. I think if the Senator from Rhode Island would indicate some day in the future, within two or three weeks, or even a month, when we could decide that we would vote on the bill and all pending amendments, why, then this matter might get out of the way for anybody or anything, and the Senate could turn its attention to something else, and the pending bill would be called up only when some one wanted to speak on it.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, it is that we go ahead with the regular discussion until we can fix a time for taking up the amendments. I do not like, for the reason I expressed a moment ago, to be presenting an amendment when some Senator wants to make a speech covering the whole subject, but I will be willing to fit in any time or any place. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will doubtless desire one day, and if the Senator could only tell us something about how many Senators desire to speak we could then get some idea as to when we might reach amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. If Senators will not be kind enough to notify me of their wish to speak, much less of the time they have selected, I do not see how I can gratify the Senator's desire. But I am doing the best I can. I make inquiry; I give notice around that I would be glad to have any Senator who wants to talk to do so. I do not want to press this matter, as I said, with undue haste or to obstruct any of the ordinary and legitimate and proper things that we have to do here.

Mr. FORAKER. I am told by Senators about me that the conference report which has been under consideration can perhaps be concluded in a short time. I suggest to the Senator that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily and that that business be concluded, if that be the desire of the Senator from Minnesota, who has it in charge. I will follow after that, if it is not too late and if it is agreeable to everybody.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. If my friend from South Carolina is able to restrain his inexperienced zeal for a few days, until a few more of the important speeches have been made, I hope that we may be able then to get some agreement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator inform me from his side of the Chamber when any more important or set speeches are to be made?

Mr. ALDRICH. I spoke of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who will speak to-morrow. Just what effect that will have upon the debate I do not know. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has already announced his purpose to speak. I do not know of other speeches on this side. I should think that before the end of this week we might be able to foresee the end, perhaps, of what might be called the general discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President, I shall, of course, have to be content with what appears to be very meager information.

Mr. FORAKER. I am just as impatient as the Senator from South Carolina, and I shall have to be content, too.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now I ask that the unfinished businsess be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senator from Minnesota be allowed to go on with the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the unfinished business be temoprarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I should like to have the ruling of the Chair as to what authority, if any, the conferees of the Senate have got to take up and to act on a report which is in the possession of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The RECORD discloses the following. This is the record of yesterday's proceedings:

Mr. CLAPP. I formally withdraw the other report and submit this one. I ask that it may be published in the RECORD, so as to appear in the morning.

The Chair is clearly of opinion that the chairman of the conferees on the part of the Senate had a right to withdraw the report which had been submitted, and that he also had a right to make the report which is before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President, that still does not answer the query. My contention is that the conferees of the Senate, having submitted a report on the 3d of April, or some day preceding it, which certainly was discussed on the 3d of April, and having left that report on the table of the Vice-President, they had no jurisdiction of this subject from that day until yesterday evening; that the Senate conferees have had no authority whatever to act in dealing with this subject; that the whole subject yesterday afternoon was in the possession of the Senate and in the same parliamentary condition as it was when the report was presented. Yet, in the face of that contention of mine, which the Chair seems unwilling to decide——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Chair has not been fully understood by the Senator, he will say that he has no power to go into the conference room; that he has power only to deal with the status of the report as it appears upon the record of the Senate, and all questions that may arise thereon.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I ask the Chair to rule on the question which I submit to the Chair, whether or not the report which was presented here last week remained in the possession of the Senate, outside of the jurisdiction of the conferees, until 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, or whatever hour it was when it was withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report remained in the custody of the Senate until it was withdrawn, as disclosed by the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I want the Chair to rule as to whether a new report which was printed two or three days ago is a valid and legal document; whether the conferees have not transcended their authority and usurped authority by going out in some room here and taking the report which was on the table of the Vice-President and working upon it as though it had been withdrawn and was in their jurisdiction. That is what I want the Chair to rule on.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report is here at the Secretary's desk, and was formally laid before the Senate by the Chair.

Mr. TILLMAN. At what hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yesterday afternoon. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will yield to me, I wish to suggest that there is only one way to dispose of this question, and that is to vote on the question whether we will accept the conference report or reject it. That is the only question before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That, in the opinion of the Chair, is the only question that is before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I dislike to persist in trying to get the ruling of the Chair upon a proposition which he does not seem willing to discuss or to present to us and give us his opinion on. Let me say to the Chair he has the documents there or he can get the printed documents here. I have here Senate Document 269, being the conference report presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] March 19. The Chair has just ruled that that report remained in the possession of the Senate and under its sole jurisdiction until 5 o'clock or such hour yesterday afternoon when it was withdrawn.

Immediately upon the heels of that withdrawal "Mr. CLAPP presented the following," being Document No. 307, relating to the same subject-matter, which had already been printed, and he brought it into the Senate with the indubitable evidence that the conferees had taken jurisdiction over this Indian bill; had gone out and acted as though they had it in their control; had prepared a new report and had it printed before they withdrew the old one.

Now, I want to ask the Chair to rule whether or not the new report is a legal document; whether there was any authority for the conferees to prepare such a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Carolina be kind enough to send to the Chair the document which he says is the report?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will send the two documents to the Chair. Here is one which was presented last night, and already printed when presented.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The document which the Senator from South Carolina says is the conference report is a print of the conference report. The conference report itself is on the Secretary's desk, and was presented yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. But that print was made before yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference committee can make a print of its report at its convenience, at any time it sees fit. That is a matter over which the Chair and the Senate have no control.

Mr. TILLMAN. But, Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. And it can undoubtedly be thinking about things in the meantime.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it can not undoubtedly be writing about things in the meantime.

Mr. CLAPP. And it can undoubtedly be writing about things in the meantime.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to say to the Senator that this report is in the possession of the committee of conference; it belongs to the committee of conference until it has been presented, and therefore it is not subject to the control of the Senator or the control of the Senate. It being in the possession of the committee, they can give publicity to it and make it a part of the records of the Senate only when they present it. Prior to that time it is subject to change. It is not a conference report until it is delivered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I try very hard to get light, but the more people talk on this subject the less light I get. Legally or technically, I will say, my friend from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] having pressed that point so much, this report, in my judgment and according to the ruling of the Chair, was in the possession of the Senate, with full power to do anything it pleased with it, and without the jurisdiction of the conferees to do anything they pleased with it. That report being in the possession of the Vice-President (the President of the Senate), until withdrawn the action of the conferees in going off and agreeing to those changes is a clear personal usurpation of authority, which possibly saved time, but has no legal existence or standing. However, I may be in error.

Mr. CLAPP. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, let us get back, without raising the issue as to whether or not this conference report is in here legitimately; let us brush that aside as a technicality which does not affect the matter, and go down to the meat in the proposition.

I am sorry that I will have to appear to repeat, because there are a number of Senators here who were out a moment ago when these facts were brought out, and for the benefit of those Senators—and I hope they will give me their attention for a few moments—I want to state just what is in issue here.

There is a provision in the original bill which the House passed which was stricken out by the Senate, and in its place a Senate amendment was put. That Senate amendment provides, among other things, for the validation and ratification of the acts of one Brown, administrator de bonis non of some Seminole Indians in the Indian Territory, for whom Congress had in 1900 appropriated $186,000. Brown paid out this money, but he paid it out in such a way that the claimants, the Indians, to whom it belonged, have felt that they were robbed or imposed on. Their complaint having reached the ears of the Secretary of the Interior, he authorized the employment of a lawyer, who is now prosecuting in the courts there this administrator for maladministration and to recover the money which the Government had appropriated to the Indians six years ago.

The Senate amended this bill in such a way as to validate Brown's acts, thereby throwing those suits out of court. The lawyer employed by the Interior Department is to be thrown out of court by an act of the Senate. Instead of leaving the matter in the jurisdiction of the court to determine whether or not Brown had administered his trust honestly and in accordance with the law, the Senate steps in and declares that Brown has administered that estate honestly, that his act shall be validated, and that the suit shall stop. That is the sum and substance of it.

The Senate put this provision in the bill and the House disagreed to it, except with an amendment. That was the condition of the old report, which was on the President's table yesterday afternoon; and now the report which was born a day or two before the old one was withdrawn is in the possession of the conferees. The new report put the Senate amendment out of consideration, and the thing is done, it is settled finally; in other words, there is no longer any contention between the two Houses; and, as I understand it, this last report settles all the differences between the two Houses. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if that is not true?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; it is a full report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. Now, then, Mr. President, it is very evident to my mind, as the Senator said a moment ago, that these Indians will have the right to go into court and sue as individuals; that they are no longer wards of the United States, but are citizens, and will have the right to complain about this, because in this very same report there is a provision which looks to a continuation of the guardianship of the United States over these full-blood Indians for twenty-five years longer—a new provision. In one case we say they are citizens, and therefore we ought not to protect them by having a lawyer employed to sue in their interest, and in the very same breath we say they are not capable of taking care of themselves, not even the grown ones, and we are going to continue guardianship and control over their property and prohibit them from alienating their property for twenty-five years longer. Now you see it and now you don't. [Laughter.]

These poor little orphans down there, whom Mr. Brown may or may not have defrauded, were sought to be protected by the Secretary of the Interior by bringing suit to recover; and we say that is not worth while, that this man is clean and honest, instead of letting a jury say so, or instead of letting a court determine whether he is clean and honest; we say on an ex parte statement that we will not try the case. That is what I am objecting to, and that is why I want this report rejected, in order to strike out the provision in this bill which validates the acts of Brown and destroys the opportunity of these little Indian children, the heirs of the Seminoles who have died, of getting back from him what he has misappropriated.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. As several Senators have entered the Chamber since this matter was first brought up, I want to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that this does not do what he claims it does. It does so far as the United States Government is concerned, but there is a proviso that this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him. The only question at stake is whether some lawyer down there can come up here, work up a job, get a fee from the Government, and bring 225 suits, or whether these people, like other people, shall be left to bring their own suits. That is the only question that is raised by this amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator says that with a great deal of emphasis, and no doubt he believes it; but the question is, Did the Secretary of the Interior permit himself to be duped or gulled by any lawyer who came here hunting an opportunity to bring these suits? If so, he is not fit for his place as a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that does not follow from what I said. So far as the Secretary of the Interior being duped, he was not duped in this matter probably; but what I said was, that in all probability—and I repeat it—some lawyer found that this probate judge had approved the accounts of this administrator in chambers, instead of in open court, and so he comes up here and makes it appear, just as the friend of the Senator from South Carolina, who has aroused his sympathy, has made it appear. I would not say the Senator had been duped in this matter; but it is in that way that attorneys get these jobs, and I use that term advisedly. These things do not always emanate, they are not always initiated by the Department; but men down there work up these things, and they get the Secretary to employ an attorney at the expense of the United States Government to bring some 225 suits, I think the number is.

Mr. TELLER. Not in the name of the United States?

Mr. CLAPP. No; not in the name of the United States. As I have stated before, I was not much in favor of this amendment, but I believed that it should be discussed in its fullness. This Senate ought not to be led to think that this amendment, which perhaps is not any longer on our desks, absolutely takes away the right of these people to recover, if they have any such right. On the contrary, that right is expressly preserved by the language of this amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The language of this amendment, Mr. President, reserves that right to the ear, but breaks it to the hope. But just consider for a minute what chance there will be for some ignorant Indian children, whose estates have been "absorbed"—if you like that term better than "stolen"—by this administrator whom we appointed; for we selected Brown, they did not. We authorized Brown to pay out this money, and we prescribe the manner in which it should be done. Then, if he did comply with the law, why do you not let the court settle it instead of having the Senate settle it? You let the court settle it by putting it back on each individual Indian, whether he be a grown one or a child, who undertakes to sue individually in the court, to determine whether or not he has been wronged by Brown. That is the way you do. You have been acting as guardians for these Indians; you intend to continue to act as guardians after preventing them from selling their property, although they are such great "citizens;" but you will not act as guardians to protect them from the thieves whom you put in charge of their property. I say it is a disgrace; and when I am told that some lawyer comes up here to get a job, and I look at the course which this amendment has followed in getting into the Senate and through the House, the necessary inquiry in my mind is whether some lawyer or some one else has not been here in Brown's interest.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me if I interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. If he was here, the Senator from South Carolina was asleep at the switch; but this measure passed the open Senate ten days or two weeks ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. The time when the Senator from South Carolina was asleep at the switch was when the committee of which the Senator from Minnesota is chairman stole it from my committee, for I am chairman of the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes, and this bill ought to have gone to my committee.

Mr. CLAPP. It would have been a sorry spectacle if it had.

Mr. TILLMAN. It would not have had a steal like this in it, if I am not a lawyer. I would have protected these Indians, as far as I was able, from having a lobbyist come here and throw them out of court when the Secretary of the Interior had employed a lawyer to protect them against the agent of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, I will read just what the Senator from Minnesota himself said on April 3——

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator reads that, I want to state——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. For the benefit of Senators who have come in since this discussion opened, I will say again that on that day I stated that I had felt rather against this amendment. I have been all the time rather against it, and I am not defending it now, but I do want the statements made about it to be full and accurate. That is all I care about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want the Senator to have the very fullest opportunity to cover every solitary point and side of it. I will simply read his language, and if he is not satisfied with that he can elaborate it. He said:

> But there is a good deal of evidence in that matter—

That is, the Brown matter—

> which, to speak guardedly, perhaps throws some suspicion around the transaction. There seems to have been a sort of circuitous route by which a good deal of the money went to many who were very closely connected with the administration of the affairs down there, at least so much so that I felt no hesitation, if there was any demand for it, in leaving it out, though I am not as clear on the subject, perhaps, as I might be.

In addition to that, in the open Senate the Senator from Minnesota promised me that it would go out in conference, and yet here it comes back, agreed to by both bodies. Now, with that statement, I am done.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator knows that is not a fair statement to make.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to do the Senator any injustice.

Mr. CLAPP. You know that it was absolutely beyond the power of the Senate conferees to strike out the Senate amendment. What I said was that, so far as the Senate conferees were concerned, it would be their sense to strike it out. I said:

> I think the Senator is quite correct, and, so far as the chairman is concerned, it will be the sense of the conferees to strike that out in conference.

And one of the Senator's own colleagues has stood here to-day and stated that the effort was made, and made in good faith; and the Senate conferees stood by the chairman on that question. The Senator has no right to refer to it in that manner.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I do not want to do the Senator any injustice.

Mr. CLAPP. Then be fair.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to be fair. I simply want to state the facts. I was told by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], whose knowledge of parliamentary affairs the Senator from Minnesota will not dispute, that when the Senate, if it should so choose, should order that amendment receded from in the open Senate it was permissible to do so; and I sat here waiting for three-quarters of an hour or longer to get an opportunity to move that the Senate recede from that amendment.

I was told by the Senator from Minnesota that it would go out in conference; and yet when the report gets back here not only has the chairman of the Senate conferees not stood by his promise to me—I did not even know who the other two Senate conferees were—but the House insists on adopting the Senate amendment without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i," though they once refused to accept the Senate amendment without an amendment. Then the Senate conferees stood up so strenuously for what the chairman said would be the action of the conferees; they stood so strenuously for that which they supposed to be the will of the Senate that they agreed to it as soon as they got a chance. I do not charge any bad faith——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will not charge the Senator with bad faith——

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is talking again of a thing he does not know anything about. The Senate conferees did not agree to it as soon as they got a chance. There were two or three days that we were trying to get the House conferees to strike that provision out, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will admit. For the Senator to stand here and say that the first chance we got we agreed to it is unfair.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not suggest it that the Senator should beg my pardon, but that he should ascertain the facts, and then discuss them. For him to stand on this floor and say that the first chance they got the Senate conferees acceded to the request of the House, is not borne out by the facts. Not only that, but in the effort to get them to strike this out, we called the Senate committee together and got their consent to putting this provision on the Indian appropriation bill, so that it would be a subject again of discussion in the Senate. At one time it looked as though the House conferees, in view of the assurance that the item would go on the appropriation bill, would recede and let this item go out, but afterwards they refused to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to do anybody an injustice. It is not my nature to do so; and I am not disposed to complain too strenuously of the Senator from Minnesota, because possibly he could not help himself. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who knows something about this matter, objected to it, and said he wanted to speak on the evening when we had the conference report up before. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said the item ought to go out, and told me it could go out, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] told me it could go out, and he would help to get it out; and yet here we are face to face with the fact that we have got to let this conference report go through, and let this wrong or outrage, or whatever you may term it—it may be a mistake—go through.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure, always.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the fact to be that about 240 suits have been commenced in connection with this matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Two hundred and twelve, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] says.

Mr. CARTER. The number is approximately two hundred and something.

Mr. TILLMAN. Two hundred and something, anyway.

Mr. CARTER. The question arises in my mind as to whether this amendment in its present form, if adopted, will cause these actions to abate. If so, has the statute of limitations intervened so as to prevent the institution by individuals of other suits to enforce their rights? It would be rather unfortunate, I think, where a substantial right is alleged, to have an act of Congress abate a pending suit if the defendant could plead the statute of limitations as to an action now commenced. That is a very important matter to determine. If it is to be determined in the affirmative, then the Senate should resort to very strenuous measures to prevent its culmination.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to make a statement to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I want to state to the Senator from Montana that these people are citizens of the United States and not Indians under the law. They have brought the suits in their own names, and this amendment in no way interferes with their suits.

Mr. CLAPP. And it would not abate them.

Mr. TELLER. It would not abate them, and could not abate them if we had put it in the bill that it should abate them. The Senator knows that. They have brought the suits, and the Secretary of the Interior has employed counsel to prosecute the suits at the expense of the United States. The Senator was not here when I made a statement upon the facts in this case.

Mr. CARTER. I was not, and am glad to hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. When the Senator from South Carolina gets through I will repeat briefly what the facts are.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read the amendment——

Mr. CARTER. I will state further, in order that the Senator from Colorado may be advised of the suggestions that occurred to my mind in the matter from hearing the general debate, first, the Indians were, as I understand, under the guardianship of the Government and a certain act of Congress was passed appropriating a considerable sum of money, which was paid by the Government to a guardian or an administrator, who was expected to make distribution of the funds thus paid to him. Presumably that administrator was under the control of some court. The Government then reached the conclusion during the period of guardianship over the Indians that the administrator had not discharged his trust faithfully and well, and, so believing, commenced an action, or a series of actions, to compel an accounting by the administrator and the payments of the amounts due. While those suits are in progress, this legislation comes forth for consideration. I believe that is the present situation of the matter, at least I so understand it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read the amendment for the Senator's benefit.

Upon dissolution of said tribal governments—

This is the amendment—

Upon dissolution of said tribal governments—

Which this bill, I believe, is to end finally. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota to tell me whether this bill is not for the purpose of finally ending tribal governments?

Mr. CLAPP. So far as it can be done at this time the tribal governments are maintained in order to safeguard against any contingency there as to certain land grants.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that the bill especially continues the tribal relations in force, and does not discontinue them.

Mr. TILLMAN. The amendment continues:

All causes then pending in any tribal courts—

As I understand, these suits are in the United States court—

Upon dissolution of said tribal governments all causes then pending in any tribal court shall be transferred to the United States courts in Indian Territory by filing the papers therein with the clerk of the proper district, after which such causes shall proceed to final determination as if originally instituted in said United States court.

Now, here is the trouble with me:

The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed.

In other words, the acts of this administrator in paying these Indians what the Government appropriated for them are taken absolutely out of any and every court's possession, because they are validated and they are confirmed, with this proviso at the bottom:

Provided, That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

In other words, they say to the little orphan Indian children, and others, even grown Indians who are like children, you can bring suits for your own benefit individually, but the Government will no longer protect you by paying for the lawyer it had already employed to prosecute the suits. And instead of leaving the matter in the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, who is charged with administering the affairs of these Indians, Congress steps forward and declares the acts of the administrator valid and lawful—no harm done—and places the responsibility and the burden of suing a rich man upon the individual Indians or the children of Indians. That is the situation. If the proposition receives but one vote, I shall ask for the rejection of this report because of this infamy.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not suppose it is necessary to repeat what I said before, but some Senators have come in who seem not to understand this matter, as evidenced by the question of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], and I wish to make a brief statement of the facts.

The Senator from South Carolina thinks he has found a steal here. He is the only person, so far as I know, who holds that there has been a steal.

Some of the Seminole Indians took part on the Confederate side and some on our side during the civil war. When the war was over those who had been affiliated with us, the United States, claimed that they had been damaged by the Confederate soldiers, both Indian and white, to a large extent, in the way of the loss of stock and houses and fields, etc. They made their claim immediately after the war. They repeated it for several years. Finally, after they had become citizens of the United States, they employed some attorneys to prosecute this claim before Congress, and Congress finally made an appropriation, an appropriation that had been recommended several times before, but never had become a law.

The Government of the United States, after this appropriation was made, authorized a man by the name of Jenkins to take the money and go down and pay it out, not to the tribes, not to Indians, but to citizens of the United States who were entitled to it under the law—the men who had been loyal and who had been in our Army. There was no trouble to find who they were because there was a record of their services for the Government. But there were some minor heirs who were to be paid as well as adults who had survived, and Mr. Jenkins paid over the money that belonged to the heirs to a man by the name of Brown, who was the treasurer of the tribe. Mr. Brown was appointed guardian, and he paid out the money to the heirs. He went before what would be called, in my country at least, a "probate judge" to approve of his conduct; that is, the payments. The judge in chambers, when he ought to have done it in court, approved of his act.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. I will if the Senator will not put in another speech.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to do any more talking. I have said enough. I want to ask the Senator if the settlement of an estate, which this practically was, and the final closing up of the account are not required by the law to be done in open court?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why is that the case, except to give everybody an opportunity then and there to be present and protect his rights?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator asks me a question which is pertinent to this matter, I will answer it. The Senator has twice made a statement here, and he has not been accurate in his figures or his facts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wanted to get some legal information from the Senator, but if he is not willing to give it to me I will have to be content with my ignorance.

Mr. TELLER. In the Indian Territory the probate matters are governed by the laws of Arkansas, except as to the Seminoles, who are not under their provisions. With respect to every other Indian tribe down there an approval in chambers is just as effective as in open court. I will venture to say that in a great majority of the cases throughout the country the settlements of estates are made in chambers and not in open court. At least that has been my experience, and I have had some in that line for fifty years.

Mr. Brown paid the money to the Indians. They have the money. There is not a man who has ever dared to say Mr. Brown did not pay the money to the parties to whom it belonged.

Mr. TILLMAN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but the chairman of the committee has said that some of it went in the payment of store accounts and one thing or other that indicated that very little ever saw the Indians' hands.

Mr. TELLER. There were some store bills paid, but they were paid on the order of the Indians, or of the guardian, whose business it was to pay them. He had a right to pay them, if they were the debts of his wards, and if he had gone into open court and had the account allowed nobody would have questioned it.

Then a certain party down there—a lawyer—went to work and brought suits. Those suits were not brought in the name of the United States. They are not touched by this amendment. They are still pending; and I need not say to the Senate, most of whose members are lawyers, and if not lawyers at least have enough common sense to know that the United States does not have the power to dismiss a suit that a citizen has brought anywhere, not even in a Territory. Those suits are pending. Somebody thought there should be added, and it was added in committee, this clause, which was thought would make it certain:

> That this shall not prevent any individual from bringing suit in his own behalf to recover any sum really due him.

There may be some minors who have not brought suit. The Secretary of the Interior, I understand, has employed somebody to prosecute these suits. They are not Government suits. They are the suits of individuals. These people were citizens of the United States on the day the contract was made with these attorneys. They were citizens when the Government voted this money. It was undoubtedly the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to send somebody down there to pay out the money, as he did when he sent Mr. Jenkins. Mr. Jenkins paid certain money to the guardian. He has made his report. Nobody questions it.

The proposition was simply to provide that Mr. Brown and Mr. Jenkins would have no further relation with the Government. The Government has not claimed any further relation with them. The party who brought the suit, a lawyer, as the Senator from Minnesota said, I presume has a contract that he shall have 50 per cent or more of all he recovers. If he can recover something, he will be ahead, and if he does not recover anything he will not lose anything. That is the condition.

On the question of unfairness on the part of the chairman, I do not think I need say a word to the Senate. I do not think he needs any defense. But this was the fact. This amendment, which is exactly as it passed the Senate, not having been changed by a single word, was accepted by the House committee and became a part of the bill. It was not subject to revision even by the committee without the unanimous consent of the conferees. Two members of the conference committee at least, I am told—I was not a member of the conference committee—two men on the House committee, two men of as high character as there are in the House of Representatives, two men who have had more to do with Indian legislation in the last ten years than any other two men in the United States, I will venture to say—one of them, at least, by blood having as much interest in the Indians as the Senator from South Carolina—who would not stand for a moment for anything that was dishonest or unfair, said, "This matter is settled. We will keep the amendment in the bill. It is in the interest of good government and justice and right."

Mr. President, as I said, and I repeat it, there was no evidence before our committee that even an Indian complained—not one. Mr. Brown, I will venture to say, from what I know of him, and personally I do not know him, has a reputation as good as that of any man in the Indian Territory. He is a man of high character, who was a member of the tribe of Seminoles when it existed; a man who has been honored by the tribe. He has not stolen anything. But it is thought that perhaps he disbursed money without authority, because he did not have the authority of the court. His appointment was made in the same way—in chambers. The approval of his accounts took place in chambers; and then it was found that the Arkansas law which authorized that to be done applied to every Indian tribe there except the Seminoles. If the same course had been pursued with respect to the Cherokee or Choctaw tribe, it would have been valid under the law. But the Arkansas law did not apply to the Seminoles, and so there is a technical question.

The 210 or 211 suits are pending and are not disturbed by this bill. The Department may go on, if it sees fit, and employ an attorney to prosecute a suit in the name of the citizens of the United States, for their benefit, but if it does it will be a dereliction of duty at least, for when an Indian becomes a citizen of the United States he in all respects stands like any other individual citizen. I have here the authority of the Supreme Court, an authority from which there is no dissent, that in all respects Indians, when citizens, stand like any other individual. We have not pretended to continue any guardianship over those Indians, and have not exercised any guardianship over them for some time in the past.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is so thoroughly acquainted with this partiuclar case that I wish he would enlighten the Senate upon this proposition: What is the necessity of inserting this provision in the bill? In other words, what injury and injustice would follow if it be left out? I think I know pretty well myself, but I think the Senator knows it much better.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what bond Mr. Jenkins gave, but Mr. Brown gave a bond of $300,000 to the Government of the United States for the proper expenditure of the money. He has paid it out, and he has paid it out as it ought to have been paid out. There is not any question about that; and if the matter could have been discussed in the open Senate there would have been some evidence brought here, if it had been required, to that effect. But the bill passed without any controversy whatever until the Senator from South Carolina received a letter from down there—I do not know who it is from; perhaps it is from this attorney or somebody else—saying there is something wrong about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not from any lawyer.

Mr. TELLER. And on the strength of that the Senator asserts that there is a steal in this. There is not a particle of evidence of a steal, and if there had been a reasonable doubt before the committee, the committee would not have inserted it. I get my ideas of this from men who know, and I will venture to say that one of the members of the House committee knows about these facts just exactly as I know about them. We have given as much attention to it as we could give. We have had an arduous time, as I have stated before, with this bill. We have devoted more hours to it than any committee has devoted to any bill in the Senate in years; and then a Senator who knows absolutely nothing about it, who is ignorant of the very first fact in the case, tells us that the Government has brought a suit, when the Government has not brought any suit. Those are individual suits, which we leave pending,

Mr. SPOONER entered the Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Wisconsin has come in. The Senator from South Carolina took the liberty to say that the Senator from Wisconsin knew something about this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I took the liberty, if the Senator will pardon me, to say that the Senator from Wisconsin, at the close of the debate the other evening, when this bill was last before the Senate, said he wanted to talk on it. That is all I said.

Mr. TELLER. Whatever it may have been, I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin that these men have been citizens for at least four or five years. They were citizens when the attorneys made the contract with them. They were citizens when the money was voted. They were citizens, of course, when it was paid, and the Government of the United States has no right to say, and it is under no earthly obligation to say, that there has been any fraud, unless it has the proof of it, and if there is any, it must be left to each individual to assert his own right, and the Government is powerless under the law to come in here. The Government may employ somebody to prosecute the suits, if it wants to, and there is nothing in the bill that prevents the Secretary from employing counsel, if he sees fit. The relation between Mr. Brown and Mr. Jenkins and the Government is determined by this bill, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator answer me a question? What are the scope and power of the words "the disbursements," going on to say of Jenkins and Brown, "are hereby ratified and confirmed?"

Mr. TELLER. That is——

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a minute. Let me get through the question. Does that mean that the receipt of the money from the Government by Brown is ratified and confirmed, or does it mean that the payments by Brown to the Indians are ratified and confirmed?

Mr. TELLER. It means that so far as Brown and Jenkins have performed any service for the Government, that credits them with proper service. That is all there is of that.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Colorado has referred to me in relation to this matter as having some knowledge.

Mr. TELLER. I merely said that the Senator from South Carolina said that the Senator from Wisconsin had some knowledge.

Mr. SPOONER. I know nothing whatever about the matter. I was informed that the Government had employed counsel either to investigate this matter, or, it having been investigated, to bring suit.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator that I never understood that the Government had any counsel, except what the Senator from South Carolina has stated. It may be true.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what the Senator from South Carolina stated. But I think if the Government sustains any relation of trust to it, perhaps it would be more generous and just, if originally it is responsible in any way for the expenditure, that the Government should not step out of it, or be put out of it by legislation, and leave the heirs, some of whom I am told are children, to prosecute individual suits, which in all human probability they would not do. That is based upon my prejudice against legislating in a controverted matter; that is all.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all I am quarreling about.

Mr. SPOONER. My difficulty with it is this——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin understands that it is a Senate amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not understand it was a Senate amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a Senate amendment; and when the last report was here—we have two now; one was born two days before the other one died. The Senator from Colorado protests that I ought not to mention that, but the Senator from Wisconsin was not here then.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has mentioned it a dozen times.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin was not here. That is no reflection on him, as he was doubtless busy with other matters.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a reflection on me not to be present when the Senator from South Carolina makes an observation.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a question of my making an observation. It was a statement of a condition. I was merely alluding, in the way of pleasantry, to the fact that the first conference report which the Senator from Wisconsin wanted to discuss laid on the table of the President of the Senate until 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, or until the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] got through with his speech. Then the chairman of the committee asked to withdraw it, and immediately presented a new one.

I have been contending in my feeble way that this new one is illegitimate; that the other conference report being in the jurisdiction and control of the Senate, the conferees had no power over the subject-matter; that they have acted entirely outside of their jurisdiction and power—jurisdiction and power both, if they can be joined together. The Senator from Wisconsin has been trying to divide them. I contend that the conferees have acted entirely outside of their jurisdiction and power in formulating a new report and then, a minute and a half after they got the old one out, bringing it in.

However, without going into that technical question, the merits of the case, as I understand them, are that litigation now pending in the United States court in the Indian Territory is interfered with, and the acts of the agent and of the administrator are ratified and confirmed, and the only redress or opportunity for redress that is given is that the little Indian children, orphans, are permitted to go in court on their own hook.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that, in my opinion, if there is a controversy of that kind, whether the suit has been begun or whether counsel has been retained by the Government to prosecute the necessary investigation with a view to bringing a suit, Congress ought to keep its hands off.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state for the information of the Senator that suits have been begun. A lawyer has been employed by the Secretary of the Interior to prosecute those suits, to get from the administrator appointed by the Government an accounting to know whether he has settled honestly with those Indians.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any proposition here to interfere with those suits.

Mr. SPOONER. But, as I understand, after this bill is passed the Government is out of it.

Mr. TELLER. It ought to be out of it. It ought never to have been in it.

Mr. SPOONER. Why?

Mr. TELLER. Because these people are citizens, and have been for five years.

Mr. SPOONER. Were they citizens when this thing was done?

Mr. TELLER. They were citizens when the bill was passed. They were citizens when the money was paid.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did you appoint a guardian for them?

Mr. TELLER. A guardian was appointed under the laws of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did you not make the guardian settle in open court, according to law?

Mr. TELLER. They still have the chance to make the guardian settle in open court if they want to.

Let me tell the Senator from Wisconsin what the condition is here. The chairman of the committee was under the impression that the Senate committee could drop out the amendment at any time. The House committee and the Senate committee agreed upon their amendment. It had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the conference, except by unanimous consent. When they went back the Senate conferees found that two conferees on the part of the House—and I do not know but that the three—were in perfect accord with the Senate amendment and thought it ought to be retained. They had agreed to it. They said, "We are not going to change. That is the proper thing. We will leave it there." The Senator knows that the Senate conferees, it being a Senate amendment, were absolutely without jurisdiction of the question, and if we send back the report, probably the House will stand by the amendment and the bill will fail. If there was evidence of fraud, I am sure I would be as quick to open it as anybody else. I do not believe there is any fraud. There is not any evidence of any fraud. I do not know of anybody who believes there has been fraud, except the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? How long ago did the transaction occur out of which this originated?

Mr. TELLER. Recently.

Mr. TILLMAN. The money was appropriated, if the Senator will permit me, in 1901, and Brown was appointed administrator de bonis non to make a settlement with the Indians, and he settled it, most of it for himself, so the statement goes, and the heirs are suing, or the Government on behalf of the Indians as it wards is suing him for an accounting.

Mr. TELLER. That is not correct. The Government is not suing.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Government is employing a lawyer.

Mr. TELLER. A shyster lawyer down there brought a lot of suits.

Mr. SPOONER. Representing the Government?

Mr. TELLER. I never heard that the Government employed him. It may have employed him.

After we supposed we were through with this bill at least, and the other bill—the appropriation bill—the chairman called the committee together, and we proposed, if the House would recede and let us take this amendment out, to put it in the Indian appropriation bill, so that the Senator from South Carolina and everybody else could fight it out in open Senate. The House conferees declined to allow that to be done. It is important that this bill should become a law.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is.

Mr. TELLER. And the sooner the better.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any ground upon which the Government intervenes on account of trusteeship or anything of that sort?

Mr. TELLER. None in the world; no more than in your case or mine. I am disgusted with the idea that the Government of the United States can take away from a citizen of the United States the right to sue for what belongs to him. I say it belittles the Senate when anybody makes a suggestion of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Are these Indians citizens?

Mr. TELLER. They are all citizens. Every one of them is a citizen. It is not tribal money. It never was. It is individual money.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Government have to do with it?

Mr. TELLER. Not anything in the world.

Mr. SPOONER. How does the Government get in at all?

Mr. TELLER. It gets in because we appropriated the money, and the Government put the money in the hands of Jenkins to pay it out. He went down there and paid it out, paying part of it to Mr. Brown, as guardian, and part of it to the Indians, on his own account.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any charge made against Mr. Jenkins?

Mr. TELLER. No; except they say that it was improperly paid to the Indians; that Mr. Brown had not been legally appointed guardian, although he was guardian de facto, because the court appointed him in chambers, and then the court approved his account in chambers, when it ought to have been approved in open court. The law of Arkansas is the law that governs, but it does not apply to the Seminoles. It does apply to the other Indians. As I stated, if this had been a payment to the Choctaw Indians it would have been all right, because under the Arkansas law the judge can do this in chambers or in court.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the dissolution of the tribal relation have any relation to the matter?

Mr. TELLER. Not the slightest in the world.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course the Senator will agree with me that where a controversy is pending in which private parties are interested it ought not to be interfered with by legislation.

Mr. TELLER. I want to impress the Senator with the fact that there is no attempt to interfere; and there is not a man of ordinary common sense who will take the bill and say so, it seems to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Colorado may not know how offensive his words are.

Mr. TELLER. I will take them back.

Mr. TILLMAN. Because when the Government appoints an administrator——

Mr. TELLER. The Government does not appoint an administrator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some part of the Government did. The United States Government is in charge of the whole Indian Territory, and some of its agents somewhere did appoint an administrator, and that administrator was given this money to pay out, and after he paid it out, a good deal of it to himself, probably honestly—I do not say it was not honestly——

Mr. TELLER. None of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some of it was due him. He had credited these children or some Indians, and he settled with himself, or something like that. I do not know whether that is true or not. But there is this about it. He is charged by these Indians with having cheated them——

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. And with misappropriating their money. The charge was such that the Secretary of the Interior felt that he ought to protect them at least enough to employ a lawyer to sue him in the United States courts to recover.

Those suits are now pending, and the proposed amendment here in this bill takes those suits out of that court, as far as the Government is concerned, stops the payment by Mr. Hitchcock of that lawyer, and leaves these children and these Indians to prosecute their own individual claims against this man without any assistance from anybody. That is the situation.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Government a party to that suit?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Government is a party to it only to the extent that the Secretary of the Interior has employed a lawyer to prosecute or to sue this man Brown to make him account for the trust that was reposed in him and settle fairly and honestly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. In just a moment. I do not exactly understand this proposition. There is something rather peculiar about it. If this happened in a State, there would, in due process of law, be a judicial proceeding by a court. The Government, having no interest, I do not see what the Government has to do with his accounts as administrator. Therefore I do not see how it is at all proper to deal by an act of Congress with Mr. Brown as administrator of these children.

The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent, appointed by the Secretary of the Interior—

Now, that is one thing. What Mr. Jenkins did as agent of the Government might be ratified.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Jenkins paid this money to Mr. Brown for these heirs, supposing that he had authority to do so.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be all right. Mr. Jenkins having acted in good faith, ratifying what he did, that drops out Mr. Jenkins, he being the agent of the Government. So far so good. But this goes further and says:

and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and confirmed.

He was not an administrator appointed by the Government. He was an administrator of some Indian children appointed by a court in due course of proceeding.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. How, then?

Mr. TELLER. The court appointed him in chambers and ratified his act in chambers, when he ought to have been appointed in open court, under the law that exists.

Mr. SPOONER. But on that account shall the Government step in and ratify his disbursements?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think it does ratify his disbursements.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what it says:

The disbursements, in the sum——

Mr. TELLER. It would do the same thing if Mr. Brown was not mentioned at all.

Mr. SPOONER. This is a very extraordinary proposition.

The disbursements, in the sum of $186,000, to and on account of the loyal Seminole Indians, by James E. Jenkins, special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Interior—

That is one thing. I have no objection to that. He is the agent acting in good faith—

and by A. J. Brown—

Who was not the agent of the Government, who was acting, however he may have been appointed, as administrator of these Indian children, and whose conduct as administrator they challenge as being to their disadvantage. Now, what has Congress to do with his accounts as administrator?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that Congress has anything to do with it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then what business has it here?

Mr. TELLER. This may not be the best form of amendment. I did not draft it.

Mr. SPOONER. No; but that is what it says—

and by A. J. Brown as administrator de bonis non, under an act of Congress approved May 31, 1900, appropriating said sum.

That is simply the sum which was appropriated and which Jenkins paid over to Brown as administrator de bonis non. Now, Brown's disbursements are hereby ratified and confirmed.

Mr. TELLER. I understand it was drafted really in the interest of Mr. Jenkins. I do not know how it comes that Brown's name is in it; but that seems to be the case. However, the practical question is, What does the Senator want to do with it? Does the Senator want to send it back to conference?

Mr. SPOONER. The practical question is this——

Mr. TELLER. It is beyond the power of the Senate to change it now.

Mr. SPOONER. Without agreement with the House.

Mr. TELLER. That is true. Do you want to send it back for the conferees to try again? I have no objection to its going back.

Mr. SPOONER. I judge of it from the face of this paper. I have no doubt whatever, nobody can have, of the desire of the committee to do what is right—right by the Government and right by everybody. I understand perfectly that this bill is full of trouble and complications and intricacies which puzzled and burdened the committee. But there is a proposition on the face of the bill which can not be defended, in my judgment, here or anywhere else.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that, in my judgment, there are a dozen things in the bill that can not be defended.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, but, Mr. President, do they concern private interests, especially the interests of children? Do they thrust the Congress between an administrator de bonis non and the cestui que trust? That is this proposition.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator suppose that this body has the power to deprive a citizen of his right of action against another citizen?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator, if he will permit me to answer his question by asking another——

Mr. TELLER. I would rather have the Senator answer that first and then I will answer a question he may ask.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. TELLER. Very well. We have not attempted to do that. We could not do it if we tried to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. No. I am here dealing with children, children of those who have been under the tutelage and guardianship of this Government until recently, who have become by operation of law citizens.

Mr. TELLER. Are their rights any less for that reason?

Mr. SPOONER. No; not their legal rights.

Mr. TELLER. Are their rights any less because they have been under the tutelage of the Government?

Mr. SPOONER. No; not their legal rights. If the Government says, "We step out of this," and if the Secretary of the Interior is influenced by this legislation not to expend another penny in protecting the interests of these minor Indians, these heirs, does the Senator think that the Indians will have any protection at all? Now, the question I want to put to the Senator is this——

Mr. TELLER. I deny the right of the Government of the United States to interfere there or anywhere else with citizens——

Mr. SPOONER. So do I.

Mr. TELLER. Minors or adults.

Mr. SPOONER. So do I.

Mr. TELLER. I wish we could get rid of the idea that because these people have been wards of the Government they are to remain ever the wards of the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. But what I wanted to ask the Senator from Colorado is, What right has Congress to ratify by act——

Mr. TELLER. Congress has a right——

Mr. SPOONER. One moment.

Mr. TELLER. Go ahead.

Mr. SPOONER. What right has Congress to ratify by act the disbursements of an administrator de bonis non of a citizen of the United States appointed by a court?

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator think we have got the power to do that?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think we have.

Mr. TELLER. Nor I either.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I——

Mr. TELLER. And the bill does not do it either.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see whether it does or not.

Mr. TELLER. If it tries to do it, it does not do it.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, but, Mr. President, this has no business here and——

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that I am not insisting that it has any business here. But it is here, and I want to know what remedy the Senator proposes to take to get rid of it?

Mr. SPOONER. I am saying what I am saying, Mr. President, not for its effect here, but for its effect possibly elsewhere. So far as the bill ratifies the action of Jenkins, the agent of the Government, in disbursing money appropriated by Congress in the act referred to in the bill, he having acted in good faith, even if it be said not with the utmost wisdom, I have no objection to it. If he acted in good faith and is under bond I would not have the Government hold him to strict liability in such a case. I leave that; I am not objecting to it; but I come to this provision which could not, it seems to me, find its way into a bill upon any good ground or any possible defensible ground. We ratify or propose to ratify here as fully the disbursements of Brown as the disbursements of Jenkins. Why is that here? Why is the great Government of the United States thrust in here between Brown, the administrator de bonis non, and these Indian children who are claiming that he has defrauded them?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator to this state of facts: It is claimed that Brown's appointment as administrator de bonis non was defective in that the appointment was made in chambers instead of in open court.

Mr. SPOONER. Does this validate his appointment?

Mr. CARTER. I wish to ask the Senator's view upon this aspect of the case. Will not this act make of Brown the agent of the United States in making his disbursements and thus render the cause of action of these people against him as administrator possibly impossible of prosecution?

Mr. SPOONER. If it does——

Mr. CARTER. In order that the Senator may secure my thought fully, I will state that according to the contention Brown was not an administrator at all legally appointed. He did make disbursements. He made disbursements of public moneys of the United States handed over to him by Jenkins for the purpose of being disbursed. Do we not by this act make of Brown the agent of the United States and relieve him of liability to these Indian children who may now allege a cause of action against him?

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask the Senator from Montana a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Montana is erroneous in his statement unless the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is erroneous, because there is nothing here that I have seen or heard which relates to the invalidity of Brown's appointment. It is but the fact that when he went to settle his accounts he got the approval of the probate judge in chambers, which was contrary to the law. In my part of the country no probate judge can settle an estate and grant relief to the administrator unless he has advertised for two or three weeks to all the creditors and everybody else interested as a notice to come into court and settle, so that they may be there to protect their interests.

Mr. CARTER. I disclaim any knowledge of this subject-matter from personal investigation. My information concerning the infirmity of the appointment was gleaned from the statement made by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. That is correct.

Mr. CARTER. That he was appointed in chambers.

Mr. TELLER. And the settlement was approved in chambers when it ought to have been made in open court.

Mr. CARTER. The appointment and also the settlement ought to have been made in open court.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, what a proposition! Having been appointed in chambers, having accepted the appointment, having taken as administrator de bonis non the funds, having given his bond as administrator de bonis non, I suppose Brown would not be permitted in any court in the world, in defense of a suit for an accounting, to allege that he was not lawfully appointed. He would be estopped upon every principle laid down in the books to attack the validity of his own appointment in order to shield himself in court from a dishonest or improvident disbursement of the moneys which he had received as an administrator de bonis non.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It is claimed by these people that there is a cause of action in somebody; that Mr. Brown had not any right to receive the money because he was not a guardian. "It is true he paid the money to me, but he was not my guardian. Having accepted it, I can now ask him to pay it over again." That is about all there is of it.

Mr. SPOONER. No; that raises another question.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Brown is still insisting or trying to insist that he was the guardian. He does not repudiate that.

Mr. SPOONER. That he paid the money only to the persons who were entitled to it?

Mr. TELLER. He said he did.

Mr. SPOONER. They said he did not.

Mr. TELLER. They do not say he did not, but they say he had no authority to act for them, to receive the money or anything else for them.

Mr. SPOONER. If he paid it over to a person who was not entitled to it and to whom he would have been obliged to pay it had he been guardian, certainly that person would not be permitted to challenge the validity of the payment because he was not technically a guardian.

Mr. TELLER. Of course not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the Senator's attention to one fact which has not been brought out here. I understand that a great many of the complaints are based upon the fact that the practice in the payment of money for minors had been to pay to the guardian or to the father or mother, and that in these instances the administrator had paid the money to the father or mother though the parent had not been appointed a legal guardian of that child, instead of paying it to the child itself, and that that was the case in nearly all those payments. Now they seek to recover upon the ground, of course, that it was not properly paid to the child. I understand that that is the ground of many of the complaints.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand. The proposition is not, then, to ratify, which Congress could not do, as against third parties, or to legalize the appointment of this administrator de bonis non, but it is to ratify, or to attempt to ratify—which as powerful as this Government is, Mr. President, it can not do by any legal act—the payment by the administrator de bonis non to persons who were not entitled to the money. Is that the object of this provision? If the money was paid, the administrator de bonis non paid at his peril. He had no more right to pay money belonging to minor children to the father or the mother than he had to pay it to you, and if he paid it to them and the father drank it the relationship of the person to whom he paid it is no defense to be urged by him.

I never have known such a proposition to be in a bill, and it to me is the worst kind of legislation. There is something in it that is ulterior—on the outside, of course. It is a bad precedent. It is wrong, and so far as it could by any human possibility have any effect upon these minor children it ill befits the legislative power of the Government of the United States. I agree that if the House insists, they having agreed upon the Senate amendment, it is beyond reach except in the courts, but I sincerely hope the House committee will see its way clear and its duty clear to take it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to another matter that I understand was brought out before the committee. How is this attorney who is employed by the United States to be paid? Is he not to be paid out of that very fund? Did it not appear in evidence before the committee that all of this money had not been paid out, but that some twenty-odd thousand dollars had not yet been paid out, and that they were utilizing the balance of the twenty-odd thousand dollars to pay the expense of a suit—money that should have been disbursed generally, and which belonged to individuals who were satisfied with the disbursements that had been made and were not attempting to bring any action? I understand there was something of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, outside of this amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not outside of the amendment when you say the Interior Department shall employ an attorney and pay the attorney out of the funds that belong to the individuals of the tribe.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there anything of that kind in this?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Wisconsin will yield a moment, of course I realize as well as anybody else that the position of defending these bills subjects one to a good deal of criticism, and it perhaps can not be avoided. Somebody has got to act as chairman of this committee, some one has got to report these bills, some one has got to submit to the action of the House conferees.

As I have stated two or three times, I never was very much in favor of this amendment. I rather opposed it from the beginning, and if it had been my own choice I think I would have left it out. There were some things about it that I did not like. But there is another side to this thing. While we may stand here and plead for the Indian child, we may perhaps forget that under the ostensible purpose of setting aside the appointment of Mr. Brown the money that belongs to those people is being used as suggested by the Senator from North Dakota. There was evidence before the committee that this fund was there, and, so far as one is concerned, I am willing to stand here and say I believe that the attorney who started this thing down there thought he could get a portion of this fund if he could come up here and appeal to the Department and throw before the Department those phases of this matter which would naturally appeal to the sympathy of the Department, and get the employment of the Department. I believe the fund that is left there now—I forget how much it is—is being destroyed by this very proceeding.

While I never have favored the amendment, I must say there are two sides to it, and there is reason for the contention which the Senator from Colorado has made for the amendment. If it is true that it seeks to validate the appointment of Mr. Brown, it is an absolute nullity in that respect. If it is true that, assuming it to be valid, it would settle the account of these heirs, it is then an absolute nullity. This Government, while it may seek to project itself between these contesting parties, can not successfully do so. This Government can not bar the rights of those heirs. While the amendment may have been unfortunately drawn in that respect, so far as it came to the committee, it related more particularly to Mr. Jenkins than it did to Mr. Brown; but so far as this amendment is susceptible of the criticism that it seeks to settle that appointment, to validate that appointment, and to validate that accounting and stand as a bar to recovery, if any of those parties have a right to recovery, it must of necessity be an absolute nullity. Notwithstanding this, and to put it beyond any question, the committee added the clause which provided that this should not prevent the bringing of other suits.

I am thoroughly satisfied that the House conferees will not join in the report unless this amendment is contained in it. No stronger appeal can be made to the conferees than was made to them in this interest; and my own honest, candid judgment is that its rejection means the defeat of this bill. At the most, it is only an assertion of something—if the Senator is correct about that—the assertion of something that as an assertion is an absolute nullity.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it possible that the House of Representatives, which in the first instance knew nothing about this transaction, because they did not insert it and it is not in the bill until we got it——

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it possible, I say, that the House of Representatives will defeat this bill, which everybody concedes is an important and necessary piece of legislation, because the Senate, having mistakenly put on an amendment in relation to the affairs of one Brown—that now, if we do not let it stay in the bill, they will defeat the bill? That is preposterous. I may not know as much about the temper of the House conferees as the Senator does, but I do not believe the House would sustain its conferees in such action.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I submit a parliamentary inquiry. I had supposed that unless the House conferees and the Senate conferees agreed to a conference report upon a bill there would be no bill for the House to agree to or disagree to. If I am mistaken about that, our remedy is a very plain one.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have asked Senators who have had greater experience along this line than I have had, and I myself have had some little experience along that line, and I am told that when a controversy of this kind arises between the two Houses, and the issue is made, and the Senate says, "We wanted this once and put it in the bill, but since we have found upon fuller consideration that it ought not to be in," it is easy to get the House to instruct its conferees to consent to its withdrawal. All you have to do is to report to the respective Houses, and they will instruct their conferees what to do.

Mr. CLAPP. My experience in this body, while it has been somewhat checkered, has been brief; but I have been told by those who have been here longer that the Senate never has pursued the policy of instructing its conferees. I do not know what the policy of the House is in that respect. But the conferees on the part of the House—two of them with very long service in Indian work and one of them by ties of blood bound in sympathy with the cause of the Indian—would have a very strong case before the House upon the question of whether or not they should be sustained, not in standing against the contention of the Senate, but in standing upon an amendment that the Senate, in open Senate, had adopted to this bill. If we were standing here in the Senate insisting that the House should recede, or that the House conferees should recede from a House amendment, then it would be a different proposition, but this is a Senate amendment. While we may change our minds, while we may, after we have adopted this amendment in open Senate, say to our conferees, "We do not want this amendment," yet the House conferees would have a very strong argument when it came to the question of whether or not they should be sustained in adopting an amendment which the Senate had agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. But would not——

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator must remember one other thing, that with all the Senator's interest in this matter—and it is sincere beyond question—there can be two sides to a question, even if he is on one side of it. He must remember that the men who have insisted on this in conference, the men who are familiar with this question, the men who have been familiar for years with this work, believe that that amendment ought to be there, and they will contend for it in the House. The amendment having been adopted in the open Senate, I do not believe that we can get it out. I believe it would mean the defeat of this bill to eliminate it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not see upon what theory the Senator from Minnesota proceeds in supposing for a minute that these experienced House conferees, who know so much about Indian affairs, and one of whom is part Indian, yet never discovered the importance of this legislation when they prepared their own bill, should object to the Senate taking out of a bill a provision inserted here, as we now think, erroneously. It was not discussed, and it never could have gone in there, in my judgment, by a vote of the Senate if the facts had been brought out. It was adopted without debate, as committee amendments generally are.

Where there is no discussion and exposure of objectionable features, such amendments go without discussion, and the Senator's contention can not be correct that the House would defeat this bill on account of our contending for the great principle of letting things in court stay in court until the court determines whether there is justice or injustice or wrong or right on one side or the other, and not come here and validate the act of an agent or the act of an administrator in dealing with these funds. I do not believe the Senator understands the other House if he imagines for one minute that it will occupy such an absurd position as that.

Mr. CLAPP. Probably not; but I understand this bill somewhat, or at least this section of it, and the argument is just the argument the Senator has made, if it were in favor of the United States letting controversies between private parties alone. I am not so certain—I am not advocating this amendment, and I have stated my position several times in regard to it—that it could have been defeated in the first instance upon a thorough discussion, when it was known that it was proposed here to take funds that have not yet been paid out, and use those funds to bring 216 suits upon the technical ground that the administrator had been appointed by the judge sitting in chambers when the law provided that the appointment should be made in open court.

I say again to the Senator, notwithstanding his sympathy and notwithstanding his interest and earnestness, that there are two sides to that question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statement that has just been repeated, which was brought out by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that there is still remaining a part of this $186,000 undisbursed, which is being used by the Secretary of the Interior to employ a lawyer to prosecute these claims, is a new side of the proposition. The fact that the Secretary of the Interior must have discovered that this administrator was swindling and defrauding those children, which made him step forward and take part of the money which the administrator had not already used or stolen, is proof positive to my mind that this thing ought to go out, because it stinks to heaven of too much that is rotten.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator in charge of the bill is willing for me to enter upon a discussion of this question at this time. I was not here during the discussion on the House bill nor on the amendment made by the Senate; but I find here an amendment, which I presume the Senate placed upon the bill. I do not know but that this matter has been fully explained. I have had no opportunity to look into the matter in advance. I should like to understand it, and if it has not already been explained I should like very much if the Senator in charge of the conference report would explain it, as I have no doubt he can satisfactorily. I make this inquiry not as a matter of contention, but for information. I can not read the amendment myself, but I have had it read to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read it to the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. It has been read to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is section 19.

Mr. MONEY. Yes. I find here there is one inhibition upon the full-blood Indians alienating their lands for the term of twenty-five years. There is also a provision as to their leasing any lands other than homesteads for more than one year, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

I want to ask the Senator if this provision was put in here in view of the fact that Congress has passed a law dissolving the tribal relations and making each one of these Indians a citizen of the United States? That is according to the decision last year, I think it was, in the case of Heff, when the Supreme Court decided that the Indians were no longer in tribal relations, but were citizens of the United States, and that the United States could not resume their guardianship, if I recollect the decision aright. If this is true, then I ask the Senator what is the authority for again assuming this guardianship and declaring what shall be done by these Indians with their own private property, they being now citizens of the United States? I ask that in good faith, because I should like to have it explained.

Mr. CLAPP. That is another of the conditions we have been drawn into. After you have made a treaty with an Indian, giving him the right of citizenship, and then allotting him lands, simply with a restriction, I believe then he owns that property as absolutely as the Senator owns his own home, subject only to the restriction of alienation; and that it is beyond the power of Congress after that to enlarge that restriction, or, in other words, reduce the right of alienation.

But this question came up in this manner: There were several propositions before the committee. The committee felt that as to this matter of alienation by allottees of their lands it was a very difficult question to settle. Some felt that if they could not alienate them, they could never rise to a concept of business transactions; and that if they do alienate, they frequently squander the fruits of their allotments. But it was finally agreed in the previous conference report that we would remove the restrictions as to alienation by the mixed bloods, and decrease the restrictions as to the right to alienate as to the full bloods.

Under the laws and treaties down there, the different tribes would, before this bill passes, come into the right of alienation by degrees—some of them in one year, some of them in two years. There were different rules; but we brushed that all aside and adopted this plan. When we got it into the Senate on the former report we had placed a provision in the first part of that section that the restrictions as to alienation as to mixed bloods should be removed; but, at the suggestion of the Department of the Interior, we inserted restrictions as to leases of oil and other valuable mineral lands, subject only to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. We were then met by the suggestion that if we gave the unlimited right to alienate, we placed a restriction upon the right to lease, because by the process of leasing you might in time divest yourself of your property. If they could alienate, they could sell, but they could not lease.

It was desirable to get this bill through on account of schools, and the question of taxes arose. In the last conference report we left out all reference to the mixed bloods, leaving them under existing laws and treaties; but we put in here an additional prohibition against alienation on the part of the full bloods. The members of the committee and others contend that, notwithstanding the Heff case and the other cases, we have the right to do that. It was thrashed out to some extent here in the Senate; and it has been suggested, I will say to the Senator, that the Department of the Interior may be yet able to frame a provision in regard to the mixed bloods that will meet the possibility of oil leasing and such things. If so, we can place it on an appropriation bill. So it was thought best for the time being to put the matter in this shape, and try to perfect it later on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I have heard with great interest the history of the proposed amendment and how it came to be incorporated in the conference report; but the Senator has failed to answer the question that I wanted answered.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I must have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. No; you gave me the precise reason for doing a thing which the committee, in its wisdom, thought was best for the Indians. I am not doubting the good faith and sincerity of the committee in doing what they considered in the interest of the Indians, but what I want to know is this: Where is the authority residing in this Congress to take the property of a citizen of the United States and put it under wardship?

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I told him that personally I did not think that authority existed, but that the other members of the committee thought otherwise, and the Senate seemed to think otherwise when the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. I understand that; but I am very glad to know that so distinguished an authority as the Senator from Minnesota agrees with me that there is no shadow of authority for any such action.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator may withdraw that when he hears the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. MONEY. I do not think I will. I know the Senator is just as well informed about this as anyone else. He is a great deal better informed about it than I am. I do not understand the Indian business at all; it has not been part of my study; but I do know that this Congress has no right to take charge of the property of any citizen of the United States, waiving the treaty relations which we have been steadily disregarding with these people for a hundred years or more. I am referring to the act of Congress which made them citizens, and I am referring to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the only case which comes to my mind—the Heff case—though I suppose the Senator is familiar with many such cases.

Mr. CLAPP. The case of In re Heff.

Mr. MONEY. That was the case in which the Supreme Court declared that Heff was a citizen and that the United States could not take charge of him. Now, if the United States can take charge of citizens of the United States of any blood in the Indian Territory, they can go into Mississippi and take charge of my private property. The fact that the Indians were once in tutelage does not furnish any argument at all as to their ability to be on an equal level, so far as political and civil rights are concerned, with everybody else. It is similar to what you are now doing in trying to admit Territories to the Union with provisions which they can absolutely disregard the next moment, for when they once get into the Union, notwithstanding those restrictions, they can disregard them, because one State is the peer of all the other States or she has no standing here at all. It makes no difference how many restrictions Congress may endeavor to put around the admission of a Territory as a State, if they are not around the other forty-five States and do not exist as to them, they have no force whatever. I do not believe that this committee or this whole Congress has a right to reinvest the United States with the guardianship of people who, whatever they have been in the past, are now citizens.

I might say something as to the merits of the case as opened by my friend from North Dakota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. MONEY. I hope the Senator will excuse me for one moment. I do not want to get into an argument. I should say that the Senate can rest assured that these men are going to sell these lands. The man who wants Indian lands is not going to hesitate one second to buy because this provision goes into this bill; but the provision will do this: It will put a cloud on the title. The man who wants to buy is going to get the Indian lands for about half of what he would if you do not put in the bill this fancied remedy to secure him against bad and improvident actions in his business.

We can not take care of every incompetent citizen. I would have had the United States taking care of me long ago if my lack of business capacity had been any reason for it. If I were standing in the river of Pactolus with a quart cup I would never be able to secure a grain of gold. So there are thousands of white people who are just as unable to attend to their own affairs as are these Indians. These people are citizens. I do not believe this act will stand before the courts, for I do not see how, under the treaty, under the law, and under the decisions of the court it could be otherwise than that we have no right, no warrant in law, no authority in any respect to assume a guardianship that has been relinquished. These people having become citizens, they remain citizens. I do not understand how a committee here, or the Senate, can change that relation of the General Government.

As to these leases here, the man with a surplus of land—homesteads, I believe they are, according to my recollection, though I am not familiar with these matters, the bill having come up when I was not here—as to these lands, if a man has got a homestead that he wants to improve, why not let him make a lease of his oil or gas lands, or sell them, if he chooses, and get something to improve the land upon which he lives and his children are to be reared, something that will bring him some comfort during his lifetime, and not wait twenty-five years, when they are ready to consign him to the tomb?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. As applying to what the Senator from Mississippi is saying, I propound to the committee a question. Is it not true that any one of these Indian citizens may, by application to a court or to the Secretary of the Interior, upon satisfactory proof or showing to the effect that he is individually capable of managing his own affairs, thereby secure an order releasing such applicant from the limitations placed upon his right over the land which he acquires?

Mr. MONEY. I will answer that myself. That is so; but that does not make a particle of difference. You can not put an Indian citizen under restrictions in regard to the control and management of his private property from which you are exempt or any other Senator is exempt. You have no right in any respect to take charge of a citizen's property. If he is incompetent, let the court appoint him a guardian or somebody to take care of that property. That is the business of the court; it is not the business of this Congress. Why should any citizen be compelled to go to the Secretary of the Interior, or to one of his officers, and ask permission to dispose of his property in any way that his judgment or the judgment of his legal counsel or his familiar adviser, his friend, shall tell him is best for his interest?

Why should the Secretary of the Interior be invested with this authority over this private property? I will tell you what it means. I do not say it is the meaning of the Senate; but somewhere back in that country somebody will have control of this money, and there will be graft on every solitary effort made by any Indian to part with his possessions. It is part of a scheme of plunder, in my opinion. I do not mean to discredit anybody here or anybody connected with the committee; but I can not place this in my mind in any other way. There is no reason for it unless somebody somewhere hopes to get money by it. You will find the scandal will be doubled, and if this is gone into, it will not be long before you will hear complaints from the Indian Territory that somebody is authorized by the Secretary of the Interior absolutely to grant a license to a man to sell his own property, when the law already guarantees him the care and keeping of it. It will be found that he had to pay somebody a consideration for the privilege of letting the land on lease to a gas company or an oil company or a coal company, or to any other company, or for selling to them a portion of his homestead to make it more comfortable and a means of support to him and his family.

Whenever there is anything that goes contrary to law, contrary to treaty, contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court, contrary to common sense, and contrary also to common justice or equity, like this, it becomes immediately, in my mind, the subject of suspicion that somebody wants to get in a hook somewhere to get something that does not belong to him.

I do not believe, if this bill is passed, that it will be administered in the clean and lawful way that it ought to be and that is contemplated by the committee which inserted the amendment here. The committee can not follow the executive nor the administrative government. It can not select the men who are to assume these relations to these citizens and again place them under the tutelage and wardship of the United States. It can not follow every one of them, and every transaction, and see the Indian go and ask for a re-lease to a gas company for 15 or 20 or any other number of acres of his land with the gas company standing there to pay the man clothed with authority over another man's property a sufficient sum to induce him to give a lease. He can hold that man up. Every Indian and every man proposed to be covered by this authority of the Secretary, or the court, or anybody else can be held up until he is willing to pay for what is his natural, constitutional, inalienable right. I deny the right of Congress to pass any such legislation as this, which takes charge of a man who is an independent citizen of the United States, so far as law and so far as treaties can make him so.

I do not pretend to be familiar with the subject of this legislation, but these are common facts and common principles that lie on the surface, and I say here that it is a gross injustice to every Indian down there who has land at all that he should be put in charge, as to his property, of an officer appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, or anybody else, by an act of Congress or by anything else.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator says this is a gross injustice, and in the same address he also makes the further statement that, if the white man wants the Indian's land, he is going to get it anyway, and that there is no power in Congress to protect the full-blood Indian against the rapacity of the white settler. It may be, Mr. President, that that is true, but I for one will not acknowledge the impotency of the Government to protect to some degree and to some extent the wards of the Government so long as they remain wards and so long as the protecting hand of the Government is over them.

Mr. MONEY. Are they still wards?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer that. As to whether they are wards now or not is an intricate and a complex legal proposition. I can not exactly harmonize my idea of absolute citizenship with a continuation of a tribal relation. We have continued those tribes; we have continued those Indians as members of those tribes; we have dealt with them as Indians and not as citizens, and we have passed laws for years since we declared them to be citizens which recognized them as Indians, and those laws have been enforced by the courts.

Mr. President, the Senator can not see but that there is some scheme in this; that somebody is getting something out of it. I am responsible on this floor for that amendment. It had not been suggested to me by any person upon the face of the earth, only as I have become acquainted with the Indians, and as I have become more and more impressed, especially since I have been in Congress, by an almost systematic effort to rob the full blood and every other Indian of all the property that he may have.

The Senator states that the Indian is doomed. Perhaps he is. I admit that finally he is; but I insist that it is the duty of Congress to protect him and shield him just as long as it can. I go a step further and say, if we have made any treaty or any agreement which we have since found to be inimical to the interests of the Indians, it is our moral duty to reject that agreement; it is our moral duty to pass a law that will protect him against the rapacity of the white settler. Whether that settler will get that land away from the Indian, even though we put a restriction of twenty-five years against alienation, I am not prepared to say. However, I do not believe that, if you do continue that restriction, the Indian is going to be thrown a pauper upon the Government so long as that restriction continues. I do believe, however, aye, I know it, that the moment you remove those restrictions you have got a pauper to deal with, and to deal with him as you will. Any man who knows anything about the Indian's character—any man who knows the history of the Indians for the last fifty or seventy-five years—will not deny the fact that that is going to be the result.

Mr. President, the question arises as to what is the condition of those Indians in the Indian Territory. I will not attempt to speak with absolute certainty as to what will be the final decision of the Supreme Court with respect to what rights the Indian has obtained by reason of citizenship and what he has forfeited by reason of citizenship. I do know that so far as our treaties are concerned the Supreme Court has again and again held that so long as we can deal with the Indians we are under no obligation to maintain the condition that we create by any one treaty or agreement.

Again, we have heretofore granted an absolute patent to an Indian allottee, and after granting that allotment, giving him the absolute right to sell immediately, we have passed a further law forbidding the sale of that allotment, and the Supreme Court has sustained that law.

Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to this difficulty that we encounter. The court has again and again, even since we passed the law of citizenship in 1887, stated that although the act gave the Indians certain political rights, it did not necessarily deprive the Government of its control over the property; and that is the only position I have maintained in support of this proposition—that it does not necessarily follow because we have granted citizenship, a political right, that the Indians have thereby become emancipated from the control of the Government over their rights of property.

I have read the Heff case, and I wish to say here that the Heff case does seem to me almost diametrically opposed to this proposition, and yet in a case decided only a short time before, this proposition is laid down clearly and sustained; and the Heff case, which simply decided a political right and not a right of property, does not attempt, in any suggestion by the judge rendering the decision, to controvert or to set aside the conclusions that were reached in the case of The United States v. Rickert—the South Dakota case.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to this case, because it is clear and distinct as to what it says and the point it decided. It is The United States v. Rickert (188 U. S., 437). I wish to read first the law of Congress granting citizenship to those people, so that we will see that it is fully as broad as anything contained in the grant of citizenship to the Indians of Indian Territory. This is the act approved February 8, 1887. (24 U. S. Stat. L., p. 388.) It reads as follows:

That upon the completion of said allotments—

and the patenting of the lands to said allottees, each and every member of the respective bands or tribes of Indians to whom allotments have been made shall have the benefit of and be subject to the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they may reside; and no Territory shall pass or enforce any law denying any such Indian within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. And every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States to whom allotments shall have been made under the provisions of this act, or under any law or treaty, and every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up, within said limits, his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens.

That law passed in 1887, and a very short time after that—in 1891 I think it was—the general law was passed for the allotment of the lands of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians in the State of South Dakota. They took allotments under that act, and by operation of law their political status at least was immediately metamorphosed into citizenship. That must necessarily follow. Holding them to be citizens, with all the rights and immunities of citizens and subject to all the laws of the State or Territory in which they were located, the county of Roberts, S. Dak., levied its taxes against the land, against the improvements, against the personal property of those Indians. The taxes were not paid. The officials took, or were about to take, and sell the property when the United States itself intervened through the courts.

What authority had the United States to intervene if they were citizens and if the United States had absolutely relinquished all its authority over them? That right was not questioned on either side. It was not claimed that by reason of their political change they were emancipated from the control of the Government. But it was maintained that under the provision subjecting them to the laws of the State they must pay those taxes.

The case went to the circuit court and from there to the circuit court of appeals, and that court submitted three questions to the Supreme Court of the United States. They were these: First, had the State of South Dakota authority to levy taxes upon the lands? The lands were given under these allotments with the usual clause, and, while it was a patent, it had a restriction for a certain number of years. The State claimed that it had the right to levy the taxes and to sell the property, subject, of course, to that restriction. They could not, of course, deprive the United States of the right to compel compliance with its laws or get any claim free from that restriction. The second proposition was this: Could the State tax the improvements and remove the houses and barns and buildings? And the third proposition, Could it tax the Indians' personal property? Was it subject to taxation?

The court held as to every one of those three propositions that the State of South Dakota could not levy or collect the taxes against any of those species of property. Upon what ground? Let me read just a little portion to show what was the idea of the court. On page 442 the court says:

Counsel for the appellee suggests that the only interest of the United States is to be able at the end of twenty-five years from the date of allotment to convey the land free from any charge or incumbrance; that if a house upon Indian land was seized and sold for taxes that would not prevent the United States from conveying the land free from any charge or incumbrance, and that in such case the Indians could not claim any breach of contract on the part of the United States.

The court goes on:

These suggestions entirely ignore the relation existing between the United States and the Indians.

It seems they claimed there was a relation, even though the tribal relation had been dissolved.

It is not a relation simply of contract, each party to which is capable of guarding his own interests, but the Indians are in a state of dependency and pupilage, entitled to the care and protection of the Government.

Mark those words. This was decided in 1902, eleven years after they had been declared citizens of the United States.

When they shall be let out of that state is for the United States to determine, without interference by the courts or by any State. The Government would not adequately discharge its duty to these people if it placed its engagements with them upon the basis merely of contract and failed to exercise any power it possessed to protect them in the possession of such improvements and personal property as were necessary to the enjoyment of the land held in trust for them.

And again the court said (p. 437):

These Indians are yet wards of the nation, in a condition of pupilage, of dependency, and have not been discharged from that condition. They occupy these lands with the consent and authority of the United States; and the holding of them by the United States under the act of 1887 and the agreement of 1889, ratified by the act of 1891, is part of the national policy by which the Indians are to be maintained, as well as prepared for assuming the habits of civilized life and ultimately the privileges of citizenship. To tax these lands is to tax an instrumentality employed by the United States for the benefit and control of this dependent race and to accomplish the beneficent objects with reference to a race of which this court has said that "from their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection, and with it the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive and by Congress and by this court whenever the question has arisen.

Mr. President, when I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that case was decided so many years after this law was passed, and after the Indian had done everything which the act declared made him a citizen, it at least, notwithstanding the Heff case, which decided merely a political right, raises a question as to what the final decision of the court will be. That being the case, for the purpose of protecting these Indians just as long as we can against pauperism, I think we should allow this to go through and let the court determine what it meant, and whether it intended, in the case which I have just cited, to hold that this right of citizenship is a political right and does not interfere and was not intended to interfere with that control of the Government which is necessary to build up these Indians, individuals as well as tribes, into citizenship, and to continue them as long as possible.

If that is true, it seems to me there is ground for holding that we ought to protect them; and I say again to the Senator, you can talk all you are a mind to about civilizing the Indians the same as you would a white man—by making him get down and work himself up, but he never will do it. You can take a white man, and he may be a pauper, and that may be for his best interest, because it places him upon his own responsibility. But you must remember that he has an inheritance of thousands of years which has given him the energy, the determination, the industrial character to build himself up. The exact opposite has been the history of the red man; and because he has those characteristics we may never hope to make him the equal of the white man. If we will admit that, and proceed to make the very best Indian we can out of him, and observe our moral duty, remembering that we have stolen the continent from him—if we do our duty and continue his poor life as long as we can, we will always provide a home for him; give him a home upon terms under which he can not sell it, so that he can come back to it whenever he finds that there is no other place on the face of the earth to lay his head.

Mr. President, that is the spirit which backs the introduction of this amendment, and it is the only spirit that has controlled in seeking to make this amendment a law by passing it through both Houses of Congress, in order to protect the Indians, in the future at least, for as many years as possible.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I give full credit to the zeal and humanity of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and I especially indorse and cordially approve all the latter part of his remarks. I think he has stated the truth about the matter with great force and with great clearness and with great eloquence. I have already given both committees credit for doing what they think is best for the Indians. It happens, however, that my own opinion disagrees as to the result of this method. But that was not what I expected to debate. The only point was, and it still remains in my mind, is that when a man is made a citizen of the United States he is a citizen politically and in every other way, and that there is no authority in Congress afterwards to divest him of any part of that. It is perfectly true that when the Indian was made a citizen there were certain conditions attached. One of them provided for his property, before he was emancipated, as the Senator has termed it. That is true. But that was done in all those cases.

But when an Indian is made a citizen he is as firmly established in all the rights a citizen enjoys as in his political rights. In other words, so far as citizenship goes, there is nothing to distinguish him from the white man, whom the Senator from North Dakota so eloquently portrayed as, by a long line of inherited virtues, being the superior in taking care of himself. I want to say that I most cordially indorse every word the Senator said in that respect. He said it well. I have no doubt in the world that the Senator's good heart, which is overflowing with kindness for these poor people, has prompted him to take the position he has. In my opinion, the emotion which does his heart so much credit has a little bit clouded his reasoning upon the question of the rights of citizenship being equal in every person upon whom citizenship has been conferred. But I have been admonished by my friend, the chairman, that this is not a proper time to enter upon that discussion. I think he is correct about it. I simply rose to a question of information. I shall now leave the subject. The opportunity may perhaps offer, in connection with some appropriation bill, for a fuller discussion of this very point. I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I shall be very glad to cooperate with him in anything that will better the condition of these poor people, dependent to a certain extent, but not dependent, in my opinion, now in the matter of citizenship, when it has once been conferred. However, I will not attempt to discuss it further, because I know the Senator from Minnesota is anxious to get along with the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has cited The United States v. Rickert. That is a case where the court passed upon the question whether the Government, holding the land for the Indians in trust, could maintain an action in the courts to prevent the State from taxing the property. The case was brought in equity, and the court decided that the Government had such an interest in the real estate, because it was a trustee, that it could maintain the action. It also held that the presonal property was purchased with money of the Government and was furnished to the Indians in order to maintain them on the land allotted during the period of the trust estate; that it was, in fact, the property of the Government, etc., and that therefore the personal property could not be taxed. It nowhere asserted any principle except the protection of the property for the reasons I have stated. It nowhere asserted any right of jurisdiction over the citizen himself, and in the case of Heff, which has been spoken of, which was rendered this last summer, the court fully sustained everything that has been said here as to the citizenship of an Indian. If the courts had never held it, I do not think the lawyers would have had any doubt about it. In this country every citizen must be alike under the law.

If we can protect these Indian lands longer, we ought to do it. Whether we can add anything to what has already been done, whether, when the Government has given a patent, subject to a limitation of ten years, we can add another ten years, or five years, is a question I think we will probably leave to the courts to determine. It would be a good thing for the Indians if we could do it. Whether we can or not I am not prepared to say.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator the other day to say that there were a great many Indians down there, not full bloods, who were as capable as white men of transacting business and protecting themselves.

Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood him also to say that there were some thousands of Indians who were not full bloods who were not capable of protecting themselves and taking care of their interests.

Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought, upon that statement, that, providing it could be lawfully done, the restrictions to be imposed upon any nation should be left subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in order that those who were fit might be relieved, without at the same time subjecting the large number who were not fit to spoliation.

I find that the amendment stands now:

That all restrictions upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed on and after the 1st day of July, 1906.

It is the same proviso.

Mr. CLAPP. No; that has been stricken out.

Mr. SPOONER. How is it left?

Mr. CLAPP. It is left now that all mixed bloods are subject to the existing law, under which they will gradually acquire the right of alienation and under which they can at any time have it with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. SPOONER. I was reading the wrong paper.

Mr. CLAPP. If there is nothing——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. The Senator from Wisconsin has referred to the fact that I said some of the full bloods were capable. I do not think, taking the full bloods as a rule, that they are capable. Neither do I think the half-breeds are capable. But there are a great many Indians, who have a little Indian blood, who are very capable. I do not want to have it understood that I disparage the ability of the full-blood Indian. I have known a great many Indians, and, as I said the other day, I can call to mind now an Indian who would not be a disgrace to the Senate at any time—an intelligent, active, full-blood Creek. He is an old man now, that is true; but that is the only objection that could be made to him. However, there are some old men in the Senate.

My intercourse with Indians for forty-five years has been close. I have known now and then a full-blood Indian who never came to any public notice who was as capable as the average man in the community in which he lived, and sometimes many of them much more so. I knew an Indian called Ouray. He was a Ute Indian. He was a chief, and he came from a long line of chiefs. He was a man of absolutely great power and a man of good character. When we had difficulty with the Indians, he was the man who went out and composed the difficulty, and brought the Indians in, and did his part to make them behave. I could name a number of instances of that kind within the last forty-five years. History is full of them. The condition, as to certain Indians, in western New York, where I was brought up, still exists. We used to have in the readers the speeches those men made. A great many people supposed those speeches were written by somebody who wanted to make a good speech. I have had made to me speeches by Indians that were full of wit, sometimes amusing and at other times full of pathos, but full of intelligence, and really very eloquent speeches. I know they were eloquent, although the interpreter could not perhaps give full force to what they were, and they expressed themselves as clearly as any people in the world.

Mr. SPOONER. And always dignified.

Mr. TELLER. And always dignified, as the Senator from Wisconsin says. They usually had a sense of propriety which belongs to intelligence. The Indian is not a barbarian in the sense that many classes of the human race are. They have certain laws which are just as binding on them as ours are upon us, both morally and politically, and they adhere to them. They are not to be considered as a weak-minded people. Like all wild people and like all civilized people, they do succumb to the use of intoxicating drinks, and that is one of the banes of their lives. But they are not more so in the native state than the white man is in his ordinary condition.

Mr. CLAPP. I now ask that the conference report be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I shall have nothing more to say, but for the reasons which we have tried to bring out here I hope the Senate will not adopt this report, but will send it back to conference. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. TILLMAN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina raises the question of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Hansbrough	Piles
Berry	Dillingham	Heyburn	Scott
Blackburn	Dolliver	Kean	Simmons
Brandegee	Dubois	Latimer	Spooner
Bulkeley	Elkins	Long	Sutherland
Burkett	Flint	McCreary	Taliaferro
Burrows	Foraker	McCumber	Teller
Carter	Foster	Money	Tillman
Clapp	Frye	Morgan	Warner
Clark, Wyo.	Fulton	Newlands	Warren
Clay	Gallinger	Perkins	Wetmore

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the absentees be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. ALLISON responded to his name.

Mr. MORGAN. My colleague [Mr. PETTUS] is detained by sickness from the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TILLMAN. A quorum being present, I again renew my request for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the conference report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRYE. It is entirely evident that there is no voting quorum present. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 12, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12843) to amend the seventh section of an act entitled "An act establishing circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in such cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendment was concurred in.

LOWER BRULÉ BAND OF SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 980), and ask that the substitute be read in lieu of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill, that the reading of the bill be dispensed with and the substitute read instead. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 980) to ratify an agreement with the Lower Brulé band of the Sioux tribe of Indians in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell or dispose of the west half of townships 106, 107, 108, 109, and 110 north, range 27 west of the fifth principal meridian, and fractional townships 106, 107, 108, 109, and 110 north, range 78 west of the fifth principal meridian, and fractional township 110 north, range 79 west of the fifth principal meridian, the same being the western portion of the Lower Brulé Indian Reservation in South Dakota, comprising approximately 56,560 acres: Provided, That sections 16 and 36 of the lands in each township shall not be disposed of, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $1.25 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose: Provided further, That any Indians to whom allotments have been made on the tract to be ceded may, in case they desire to do so before said lands are offered for sale, relinquish same and select allotments in lieu thereof on the diminished reservation.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said lands, except sections 16 and 36 in each township, to be appraised by legal subdivisions, and when all of said lands have been appraised the same shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry at not less than their appraised value by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands shall be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged: Provided further, That the price of said lands when entered shall be that fixed by the appraisement or by the President, as herein provided for, which shall be paid in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry, and the balance in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry. In case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, promptly when due, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be reoffered for sale and entry: And provided further, That the lands embraced within such canceled entry shall, after the cancellation of such entry, be subject to entry under the provisions of the homestead law, at the appraised value, until otherwise directed by the President, as herein provided.

When the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That the entryman shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within six years, but nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the appraised price, receiving credit for payments previously made, and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such entrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must have received their full naturalization papers: Provided further, That the fees and commissions to be paid in connection with such entries and final proofs shall be the same as those now provided by law where the price of the land is $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That when, in the judgment of the President, no more of the said land can be disposed of at the appraised price, he may, by proclamation, to be repeated at his discretion, sell from time to time the remaining lands subject to the provisions of the homestead laws, or otherwise as he may deem most advantageous, at such price or prices, in such manner, upon such conditions, with such restrictions, and upon such terms as he may deem best for all the interests concerned.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands aforesaid, exclusive of the customary fees and commissions, shall, after deducting the amounts of the expenses incurred from time to time in connection with the appraisements and sales, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the Lower Brule Reservation, and shall be expended for their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of South Dakota, as provided in this act, and for the necessary expenses of appraising said lands as provided herein: Provided, That the money expended in appraising said lands shall be reimbursable and shall be deducted from the proceeds received from the sale thereof.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make all needful rules and regulations as to manner of sale, notice of same, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and with authority to reappraise said lands if deemed necessary from time to time, and to continue making sales of the same, in accordance with the provisions of this act, until all of the lands shall have been disposed of: Provided, That all lands herein ceded and opened to settlement under this act remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold and disposed of for cash, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not more than 640 acres to any one purchaser.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein; or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands, or any portion thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over and expend the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received, as herein provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill has been unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill only affects two townships, and it is strictly in accordance with the agreement made with the Indians in February, 1906——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the gentleman that; I asked whether this is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to; the bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to authorize the sale of a portion of the Lower Brule Reservation in South Dakota, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I now ask that House bill 9306 lie on the table, it being a similar bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16953—the Post-Office appropriation bill—Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON].

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, during the debate in this House on the subject of the engagement on Mount Dajo between our forces and a large band of Moro robbers and cutthroats disparaging reference has been made to the military operations of Gen. Jacob H. Smith on the island of Samar; and in the press of the country a comparison has been made between the Samar campaign and that on the island of Jolo. I happen to be familiar with General Smith's record, and to the end that justice may be done him I shall take the liberty of setting it forth.

This is the legislative branch of the Government, where every Member has the right to entertain and express his views on matters of public importance and concerning the welfare of the nation. We are answerable to our own consciences and our own obligations. To differ with the President is not only our privilege, but a duty which must not be shirked when our views are irreconcilable with his. Politically I always have been and still am his ardent supporter, and personally his warm admirer.

On this occasion I do not differ with him, and from the reports received so far I think it is apparent that no discredit has been brought upon the American Army. Our policy in the Philippines is simply being carried out. The islands became ours as a result of war. I only wish the fortunes of war had never placed them under our authority, but the responsibility is now ours, and it must be assumed. We can not evade it. Our duty is plain. The inhabitants of the islands must respect the American flag. They owe allegiance to the United States of America. Rebellion can not and will not be tolerated. The laws must be obeyed, and we owe a duty to the inhabitants of the island to protect them in their lives and their property from the depredations of marauders, outlaws, thieves, and murderers. There can be no civilization without law and order; and civilization can not be maintained unless the law is enforced. Resistance to law, defiance of it, must be met by force and overcome, and we can not weigh in a delicate balance just how much force must be used to accomplish the end.

But the case of General Wood is a complete vindication of the case of General Smith. This I will endeavor to establish by the facts.

What is the military record of General Smith?

General Smith was a soldier of many wars. When the call to arms resounded throughout this country in 1861 he organized a company, was mustered into the military service of the United States, and was soon at the front. At Shiloh he suffered a severe gunshot wound. He was taken from the field of battle and sent home dangerously sick. But an iron constitution and a strong will power soon asserted themselves, and he recovered and returned to his command. General Grant recommended that he be brevetted for gallantry on the field of battle. He served throughout the civil war as a volunteer, and at its close entered the Regular Army. Years of his life were spent on the American frontier in various Indian campaigns. In the war with Spain he went to Cuba with our troops and, although not the hero of that war, he now carries in his body a bullet from the rifle of a Spanish soldier. He was then sent to the Philippines, and while there was always at the front faithfully discharging his duties. A formidable insurrection broke out in Samar. General Smith was sent to quell it.

Let us now examine what Smith did in Samar and what Wood has done in Jolo.

When Smith arrived at Samar he found that the small garrison of the United States Army at Balangiga had been massacred by the natives. The garrison was surrounded by treacherous murderers while in its mess room at breakfast. Our soldiers were surprised—caught unarmed—and with neither the means nor opportunity of defense were most cruelly and brutally murdered. After the bodies were horribly mutilated the assassins left for the interior of the island. It was not until after General Smith viewed the result of this terrible slaughter—this wanton murder of American soldiers—that he gave the order for which he has been so much criticised. This order was construed by Major Waller in accordance with the laws of war and General Military Orders No. 100; and Major Waller repeatedly testified before the court-martial the interpretation he put upon this order and that the meaning conveyed by it was that only those opposing the Army—those engaged in actual hostilities—in active operations against it, were to be killed. He did not tell Major Waller that quarter was not to be given. For this order General Smith was court-martialed, and the verdict of the court, while finding that he did use certain objectionable language, found him not guilty of directing that the giving of quarter was not desired; not guilty of ordering that all persons capable of bearing arms were to be killed; and, further, that his directions were to kill only those engaged in actual hostilities. An admonition, I believe, was recommended, but, unfortunately for General Smith, he had reached that period in life when he was subject to retirement on account of age by executive order, and what followed is a matter of history. No doubt the President yielded to what he thought was a popular demand and did what he believed to be right. But what caused General Smith to issue such an order? By whom was it suggested? What were his instructions?

On October 27 General Chaffee wrote directions and gave orders to General Smith as follows:

I am also sending you the Florida, which is armed with a couple of gatling and other guns for work in the strait, with a view to stop the damned nonsense of supplying Samar from Leyte. * * * It would not be possible to ask that Leyte be put in the military column until I hear from you officially. I think, with you, that it should be done. * * * I do not propose to hamper you at all, but, on the contrary, give you all the assistance you need to crush the insurrection in Samar, and, as you say, Lukban shall not be governor of Samar if we can prevent it, and I think you can. I recognize that it is a difficult job to catch a weasel when loose in a country so bushy and impassable as is Samar. No doubt there are many places unknown to the troops where rice is grown in sufficient amount to feed a few wood mice. Therefore it may surprise you frequently to find they are able to fill their stomachs when believed they have had nothing at all. * * * The interior must be made a wilderness if that is the only remedy.

What is that but the famous order to make a wilderness of the island? General Smith issued such an order, but when he did so he had in his possession the exact language used by him in a letter which was written deliberately by his superior when not under the excitement necessarily attendant upon the view of a human slaughterhouse.

In various orders and directions given to General Smith by General Wheaton, beginning in 1900, the last order being dated November, 1901, General Wheaton, advising General Smith of the movement of the bands of Filipinos and in making reference to some wells, says:

If possible attack these bands and exterminate them, which will save officers falling into and injuring them internally (the officers, and not the wells) and then taking murderers red-handed and bringing them to the slow justice of the courts. General Grant has just made a very successful cleaning out of a rendezvous of guerrillas and robbers in the mountains, killing forty and destroying seventy-five buildings and a large quantity of ammunition and supplies.

In another letter he says:

One must never be surprised at the rascality of the Filipinos. This anent your account of Ruscas rascality. A more unmitigated lot of scoundrels and rascals never went unhung.

And in another letter he directs Smith as follows:

Do not allow the question of drills or instructions of the troops to take any precedence over exterminating armed bands. There have lately been indications of renewed activity on the part of assassins in your district. Pursue them unrelentingly. If possible, run them down and make an end of them. Less endeavor to pay rent and more to kill the villains infesting the department will have a good effect on the situation.

In June, 1901, he says:

Numbers are being murdered, towns fired into, and attachments ambushed. The best way to negotiate is to chase the scoundrels night and day and administer good medicine to them whenever possible.

In still another he urges haste, because of the volunteers that are shortly to leave the island, and says:

Keep chasing any bands you can. Get a clue as to their staying, or running, places and chase them off the face of the earth. I am much pleased with results so far as accomplished in your district. Let the good work go on until a child can, unmolested, carry a bag of pesos anywhere. We will do this if we have to hang the last black rascal in the department. Exterminate without mercy the assassins, whose inhumane outrages are a blot upon humanity.

In November, 1901, he writes General Smith:

I thoroughly understand your difficulties, and I know that you will do all that can be done with the force furnished you. The many mistakes made out here are beginning to show their effect, and unless some people get over the "little brown brother" and "poor little barefoot" silliness the so-called "war" will be protracted indefinitely.

These instructions were written to Smith while he was in the midst of his Samar campaign.

On October 5, 1901, when Smith was sent to Samar, and immediately under the command of General Hughes, after instructing him as to the best mode of carrying on the campaign on the island of Samar and where to locate his troops, he writes "to subjugate the savages of that section and to cut off insurrecto supplies and assistance from Leyte." He continues further:

The object of locating the three heavy companies across this line is to give them a fair opportunity to kill off the bands of utter savages who have hibernated in the brush in that vicinity, their favorite haunts being Salcedo, Quinapundan, Pambujan, Omagingong, the Upper Asuaz, Tanquip, and Naubag. The books call them heathens, and I guess they are all that with Moro tendencies. Simple burning out appears to do no good; they want to be stayed with and either killed or domesticated.

The order given by General Smith will not compare in cruelty with an order to "exterminate without mercy." If General Smith's order was so violent as to evidence his unfitness to serve in the Army of the United States, what do you think of the language I have quoted?

It will thus be seen that General Smith not only had precedent and authority for using the language he was charged with using, but that authority to carry out his orders was conferred upon him in writing by his superiors in command. Chaffee told him to make the island a wilderness, if that was the only remedy. Wheaton wrote him not only to kill, but to exterminate, and to exterminate without mercy, while Hughes advises that burning out is not sufficient, but that killing also must be resorted to. Here we have in writing the very language General Smith was charged with uttering. I do not condemn the language in these letters. The men using it were American soldiers, and every patriotic American ought to give support to the Army which protects him. These officers knew the problems they had to face; they knew the foes they were dealing with. Savages can not be fought in a civilized manner, and we must stand by the men who fight our battles, who suffer the most severe hardships, and who must face a cruel, savage foe. They are the judges of what kind of force is necessary.

But General Smith quelled the insurrection in a few days. The laws of war were not violated. Secretary Root found as a fact, and so advised the President, with reference to General Smith's orders, that—

No women or children or helpless persons or noncombatants were put to death in pursuance of them.

What order did General Wood give? We do not know. The report is that he was present practically throughout the entire action. He was in command. He telegraphs that a considerable number of women and children were killed in the fight, the number being unknown. In other words, Smith killed neither women nor children; Wood did. Wood is warmly praised and commended by the President. His commendation is General Smith's vindication.

Both General Smith and General Wood faced a relentless, merciless, and treacherous foe. The towns in Samar are on the coast. The interior is a jungle, well-nigh impenetrable, and can only be reached by our soldiers after the greatest of hardships. After the Balangiga massacre the natives fled to the interior. It was necessary to bring them back. General Smith did so. Every written order given by him provided for the humane treatment of these savages, encouraged them to return to the coast, and ample provision was made for feeding them. General Wood drove to the mountains a band of savage murderers and robbers who had been a menace for months to the peaceable natives and American soldiers. Robbery and murder had been rampant. They resisted until the last member of their band was slain or rendered helpless. The taking of life is always deplorable, but occasionally necessity in war demands it. We should always stand by the men who are on the firing line and support our soldiers who must fight for us on the field of battle.

In contending with a savage foe the rules of civilized warfare can not apply, for the very good reason that savages will not themselves adopt such rules. In the Philippine Islands the American soldiery must contend with such an enemy; but even in the case of General Wood, as it seems to me, the laws of civilized warfare have not been violated. The instructions for the government of the armies of the United States in the field were prepared by Francis Lieber, a noted German authority on international law, and these instructions are known as General Orders, No. 100, and were issued April 24, 1863, and approved by President Lincoln.

Section 14 of these instructions provides that—

Military necessity, as understood by modern civilized nations, consists in the necessity of those measures which are indispensable for securing the ends of the war, and which are lawful according to the modern war and usages of war.

Section 15 provides that—

Military necessity admits of all direct destruction of life or limb of armed enemies, and of other persons whose destruction is incidentally unavoidable in the armed contests of the war.

Section 44 provides that—

All wanton violence committed against persons in the invaded country and all wounding, maiming, or killing of such inhabitants may be punished by death.

From the evidence now before us it does not seem that there was any "wanton" destruction of human life, but, on the contrary, it does appear from reports yet unconfirmed that the necessities of General Wood's campaign against the Moros compelled the killing of some women and children incidentally unavoidable in this battle with savages.

There is nothing new in this question. Those who made the early settlements in this country were obliged to strive with savages, and the methods used by them do not differ from the methods necessary in the Philippines to-day.

The early colonists of Massachusetts understood the question. They never hesitated in the face of the enemy. Longfellow, in The Courtship of Miles Standish, explains the methods of the Pilgrim Fathers in dealing with savages. I commend to those who criticise the conduct of the American army in the Philippines Longfellow's famous description of the Pilgrims' council of war:

Near them was standing an Indian, in attitude stern and defiant,
Naked down to the waist, and grim and ferocious in aspect;
While on the table before them was lying unopened a Bible,
Ponderous, bound in leather, brass-studded, printed in Holland,
And beside it outstretched the skin of a rattlesnake glittered,
Filled, like a quiver, with arrows; a signal and challenge of warfare,
Brought by the Indian, and speaking with arrowy tongues of defiance.
This Miles Standish beheld, as he entered, and heard them debating
What were an answer befitting the hostile message and menace,
Talking of this and of that, contriving, suggesting, objecting;
One voice only for peace, and that the voice of the Elder,
Judging it wise and well that some at least were converted,
Rather than any were slain, for this was but Christian behavior!
Then out spake Miles Standish, the stalwart Captain of Plymouth,
Muttering deep in his throat, for his voice was husky with anger,
"What! do you mean to make war with milk and the water of roses?
Is it to shoot red squirrels you have your howitzer planted
There in the roof of the church, or is it to shoot red devils?
Truly the only tongue that is understood by a savage
Must be the tongue of fire that speaks from the mouth of the cannon!"
Thereupon answered and said the excellent Elder of Plymouth,
Somewhat amazed and alarmed at this irreverent language:
"Not so thought St. Paul, nor yet the other Apostles:
Not from the cannon's mouth were the tongues of fire they spake with!"
But unheeded fell this mild rebuke on the Captain,
Who had advanced to the table, and thus continued discoursing:
"Leave the matter to me, for to me by right it pertaineth.
War is a terrible trade; but in the cause that is righteous,
Sweet is the smell of powder; and thus I answer the challenge!"
Then from the rattlesnake's skin, with a sudden, contemptuous gesture,
Jerking the Indian arrows, he filled it with powder and bullets
Full to the very jaws, and handed it back to the savage,
Saying, in thundering tones: "Here, take it! This is our answer!"
Silently out of the room then glided the glistening savage,
Bearing the serpent's skin, and seeming himself like a serpent,
Winding his sinuous way in the dark to the depths of the forest.

This was the way the Pilgrim Fathers dealt with this question of peace and war, and so it is with the Filipinos. They must recognize the authority of the United States; they must obey the law. Murder and robbery, disobedience to law, will not be tolerated in the Philippine Islands, and the sooner the inhabitants understand that the better it will be for them. We offer them civilization, good government, law, and order. If some of the inhabitants will not accept that, but prefer to resist our authority and to plunder and murder those who do respect our authority, we must use sufficient force to compel them to do so. [Applause.]

To illustrate the character of these Moros I append interviews of Major Scott and Captain Cloman from the Washington Post.

Major Scott said:

"The Mount Dajo fight is nothing more than the proper chastisement of a band of outlaws, whose resistance to the authority of the United States and their own chiefs never at any time rose to the dignity of a national or racial issue."

The foregoing statement was made by Major Scott, who just arrived in this city direct from Manila, and to whom General Wood referred the question of the fight in his cable to the War Department yesterday.

"I can speak from experience," said Major Scott, "for I have spent eight months trying to get the Moros to settle down. They are simply an outlaw band, completely destitute of religion, racial or political significance, and I know the people of the southern islands are more than glad that these midnight marauders are at last put out of business.

"In the old days before the arrival of the American, the chiefs and datos were unable to put a stop to the plundering and pillaging of this band of outlaws. The authority of Spain was merely nominal, and its representatives could do nothing against such depredations.

THIEVERY STOPPED.

"Now things are different. The United States, by a combination of tact and judgment, has managed through its excellent officers in the Philippines to put a stop to this wholesale thievery, and I am confident that the Mount Dajo fight will be the last of its kind. The members of this band were outlaws in the eyes of their own people. The datos and chiefs wanted them brought to terms as badly as did the Americans. I reasoned with them for months and am convinced that they would never have listened to reason. People over there look upon the fight about the same as we think of a running fight with a Jesse James gang.

"Those who think the disturbance was caused by religious troubles are mistaken. The United States has never interfered with the religion of the islands, as other nations have done in their administration of the people. As a result our people have escaped the broils and petty insurrections that fell to the heritage of other Christian nations.

"The Malay Islands have always been more or less troubled with outlaws. About a century ago the better-disposed inhabitants of the province of Sarawak, in the northern part of Borneo, invited an Englishman, James Brooke, to come over and be their rajah. He did so, drove out the outlaws, and gave them such a strong and substantial government that on his death Sarawak passed to the control of Great Britain and has remained so ever since. In like manner the better class of people in Jolo feel thus toward the United States."

Additional light is thrown upon the Moro situation by Capt. Sydney Cloman, former governor of Tawi Tawi, a group of islands in the Sulu Archipelago. Captain Cloman spent two years and a half among the Moros, during which time he made an especial study of the characteristics of the people.

THEY LIE, STEAL, AND KILL.

"The Moros," said he, "are a fatalistic race of people, possessing, as far as I was able to ascertain, but one redeeming feature. They will lie, steal, and kill, but their love for their wives and children is very noticeable.

"I have no idea of the exact conditions surrounding the battle of Dajo, but I imagine from what I know of that part of Jolo that the band of outlaws, who were exterminated, had built a village in the crater of an extinct volcano, and having been unmolested for some time, they naturally were joined by their families.

"While the Moros are fatalists and will plunge into battle regardless of death, yet in the face of their foes they become panic-stricken and totally incapable of consecutive thought.

"When surrounded by the American troops and all points of exit absolutely cut off the Moros will not surrender; neither will they quietly sit down behind fortifications and fight their last battle with method or precision. Instead, they will grasp their knives and other arms and dash about in a frenzy. Their love and tenderness for children will create in them a wild desire to save them. Instead of leaving them in places of safety, where they would not be molested by the troops, the Moros grab up the children and run toward the enemy's lines in an effort to break through and save them.

"Moro outlaws in Jolo have been severely punished by the Government in the past few years, and of course they will fight desperately to avoid being captured.

TAKE OATH TO KILL.

"The desperate character of the individual Moro can best be understood by citing a few of their peculiarities. Under the Spanish Government and since Moros were prone to take an oath before the Mohammedan priest, becoming thereby jura mentado, which pledges themselves to die while killing infidels. Preparatory to starting out on their bloody enterprise the Moros will shave their eyebrows, cut off their finger and toe nails, and then, arming themselves with keen-edged knives, dash out upon unsuspecting Christians and kill until they in turn are killed. After becoming jura mentado a Moro would be disgraced if he did not die while killing Christians.

"Then there is another class of desperadoes, and that is composed of Moros who have determined upon suicide. As their religion condemns self-destruction, these men will run "amok" (amuck), killing all who come in their way, nor will they cease until death overtakes them. The only difference between the latter and former class of Moros is that the former kill only Christians, while the latter usually start in on the ones nearest to them, even though they may be their wives.

"The trouble which the authorities encounter in dealing with the outlaws is that they are supported by their family and friends. Whenever a Moro has committed some act that would entail punishment he immediately allies himself with some band of outlaws. If it stopped there it would not be so bad, but every one of his friends supports him in his outlawry and will go to great lengths to prevent his capture.

"Becoming 'jura mentado' was discontinued by Colonel Pratt, of the Twenty-third Infantry, the first governor of Sulu, who sent word to the Sultan of Sulu that if such practices continued he would send a regiment of soldiers into Maibun, the capital of Sulu, and let them become jura mentado, too."

Captain Cloman's statement regarding the characteristics of the Moros explains how it might be possible that children would be killed in a conflict between the American troops and the Moros. Even though a Moro warrior may have a child under one arm, he has a knife in the other hand, which he will insist upon wielding as long as he has strength. Consequently in firing upon the crazed but dangerous Moros it would be more than probable that some children would be injured.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, in a matter involving a comprehensive knowledge of the various departments of the postal service in the United States I should not venture to set up my opinion against the opinions of the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I freely admit that this committee has carefully considered—much more carefully than I possibly could—every item that they have incorporated into the pending bill. They have no doubt had in full view all the needs of the various departments of the service and have given such appropriation to each department as under all the conditions, in their judgment, seemed wise. In what I am to say I do not desire to be understood as undertaking to criticise the committee, either individually or collectively, for anything in the present bill, or for a failure to incorporate any feature that any Member or Members of this House might wish to see in it, but in one important respect my judgment, based upon the information disclosed in the report of the committee, is not thoroughly in accord with the judgment of the committee as expressed in this bill. I believe that it will be generally admitted that the postal clerks in the first and second class post-offices of the United States work the longest hours and receive the poorest pay of any class of Government employees. I note with pleasure, therefore, that in the pending bill an item of $500,000 is incorporated for obligatory promotions, mostly among the poorer paid clerks of this branch of the service. I regret that the committee did not make this appropriation very much larger.

I herewith submit a tabulated statement of the number of clerks of the different grades who are to be employed in the first and second class offices in the fiscal year 1907, from which it appears that 17,780 clerks will receive a salary of $900 or less, while but 7,696 clerks will receive above $900.

The occupation of a post-office clerk is not a sinecure. The clerk has no fixed hours, but must continue at his work until it is done. He is even not always on duty continuously, but must often report for a certain number of hours of work in the morning, other hours in the afternoon, and still others in the night, depending on the time of arrival and departure of the mails. It is stated by those in a position to know that the average working day the year through of the postal clerks in the first and second class offices of the country is ten and one-half to eleven hours, and during the busier seasons these hours are extended to twelve and even fourteen and fifteen hours out of the twenty-four, and for these extra hours the clerk gets no additional pay. Besides the hours that he directly devotes to the performance of his duties in the office, he must spend considerable time at home in the study of his distribution schemes. It must be apparent to anyone who makes even a superficial examination of the subject that the postal clerk is a very hard-worked and poorly paid employee.

It is a mistaken idea that anybody can be a postal clerk. A successful postal clerk must be a man of some education. He must have a quick and retentive mind, and must be able to remember and forget with about equal facility, as the changing conditions make it necessary for him to be constantly recasting his distribution and mailing schemes.

In view of these well-known facts I unhesitatingly assert that up to this time the postal clerks of the first and second class offices have not received the consideration at the hands of this House that they should. No man capable of performing the duties of a postal clerk is adequately compensated by $600 or even $900 per year. A man fit to be a clerk can not live and properly support his family on $50 or $60 per month; and since, if he gets into debt, he is liable to lose his position, he is often between the devil and the deep sea, and it is no wonder that three-fourths of the postal clerks regard their positions as only temporary, and are looking for an opportunity to better their conditions by obtaining employment outside carrying higher salaries, to the great loss of the service in the large cities of the United States. A man without any education and without any technical knowledge or experience can procure fifty or sixty dollars per month, and often seventy-five, or more, driving an express wagon or a grocer's delivery cart, where all the intellectual effort necessary is that to guide his horses.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Do you not think that the postal clerks are paid just as well as the letter carriers and the rural delivery carriers, both city and country?

Mr. HAYES. I am perfectly willing to admit that in other departments of the service what I am saying as to the clerks would equally apply.

Mr. STERLING. I think your proposition is entirely right, so far as that is concerned. The clerks should be paid more, but they certainly are paid as well as the letter carriers, both in the city and in the country.

Mr. HAYES. I am perfectly willing to admit that the carriers do not receive what they ought to receive.

Mr. STERLING. All ought to receive more than they do.

Mr. HAYES. I do think, however, that in comparison with the other departments of the Post-Office service and the employees of the other Departments of the Government the postal clerks are the poorest paid of any class of Government employees.

I am aware that the fiscal year 1905, which is the last year of which we have a complete record, shows a deficit in the Post-Office Department of over $14,000,000, and I presume that the present year and the year 1907 will show nearly as large deficits. With such a deficiency staring the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the face I can understand their reluctance to largely increase the salaries in any department of the service, and yet I believe it is a mistake to gauge our appropriations for salary purposes by the receipts of the Post-Office Department. This Department of the Government should not be considered solely as a revenue-producing agency. It has been created and exists primarily for the use and convenience of the people, and I have never heard a public criticism passed upon appropriations calculated to extend this convenience, or to improve the service, or to increase salaries confessedly too low.

During the last few years Congress has created and vastly extended the rural free-delivery service. I notice that the amount carried by the present bill includes $28,000,000 for this branch of the service. Were it not for the policy which has created and continues the expansion of this service, the deficiency of $14,000,000 would be transformed into a surplus of a like amount. I do not wish to be understood as criticising in any way the policy as to this part of the service. I believe that no money spent by the Government is better expended, but I do not believe that the people of the United States desire the postal clerks to pay for this convenience to the country population of the United States nor any part of it; and yet I am sure that if the present deficiency of $14,000,000 were transformed into a surplus of a like amount, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would gladly devote a much larger sum to promotions and increases of salaries in this part of the service than the present bill carries.

Five thousand promotions, chiefly in the six and seven hundred dollar classes, are provided for in the present bill. I undertake unhesitatingly to assert that no less than three times this number of promotions should be provided for. Any clerk having served three years in the Department, who can not earn $1,000 per year, is unfit to be in the Department at all and should be dismissed; and it seems to me that we should, by our legislation, in some manner give the clerks in this Department of the service to understand that if they prove efficient and faithful, by a series of regular promotions they may hope in a few years to come to the point where they may enjoy a salary of at least $1,000 per year, and this as an act of justice due from the Government of the United States. This is as small an amount as a man of some education, refinement, and experience should be asked to work a year for.

I herewith present a comparative table showing the number of clerks in each grade from $600 to $900 per year and the clerks above $900 per year in the service for the years 1905, 1906, and 1907. The clerks in the four grades, $600, $700, $800, and $900 per year aggregate two-thirds of the total force employed, and the proportionate number of those receiving these low salaries is constantly increasing. In the year 1905 66 per cent of the postal clerks were in these four grades. In 1906 there were 67 per cent of the total in these grades, while under the present bill 68.3 per cent are to receive between $600 and $900 per year, and only 31.7 per cent more than $900 per year.

Table showing salaries of postal clerks in first and second class offices for the fiscal years named, except clerks under $600 per year.

$600 per year	4,611	4,243	3,500
$700 per year	3,308	4,155	4,565
$800 per year	3,596	4,235	5,010
$900 per year	2,700	2,785	3,489
Under $1,000 per year	14,215	15,418	16,565
All $1,000 per year and above	7,295	7,570	7,696
Total clerks $600 per year and above	21,510	22,988	24,261
Increase in number receiving $1,000 per year and above	.....	275	126
Increase in number receiving less than $1,000 per year	.....	1,303	1,146
Per cent of total under $1,000	66	67	68.3
Per cent of total $1,000 and above	34	33	31.7

It therefore appears that while 5,000 promotions are provided for in the present bill, the condition of the clerks in the Department, as a body, is "getting no better fast." In view of this situation, what encouragement is there to the clerk to continue in the Department or to strive to be more efficient and faithful when there is no certainty that any promotion awaits him even at the end of many years of faithful and efficient service?

In one of the second-class post-offices in my district there are twelve clerks receiving less than $800 per year, who have been in the service more than one year. Those receiving $800 have served as follows: One eighteen years, 1 five years, 1 four years, 2 three years, and 1 two years. Three receive $700 per year, serving as follows: One three and one-half years, 1 one and one-half years, and 1 over one year. Three are receiving $600 per year who have served over one year. In the money-order department of this office are working side by side two clerks, doing exactly the same work, involving the same responsibility, and requiring a like degree of efficiency, and yet one is receiving $1,000 per year and the other $700, and the effort of the postmaster to secure a promotion for the last-named clerk has, for a year or two past, been without result. I have no doubt that this office is typical of nearly all the offices in the United States, as I have had repeated and urgent requests from the postmasters in my district asking me to see if I could not do something to improve the conditions and increase the salaries of the postal clerks.

As probably a fair example of the first-class post-offices in the United States, I desire to call attention briefly to the post-office at Omaha, Nebr. On December 1 last there were 103 clerks employed in this office. Of these employees twenty-one were drawing $600 per year, fourteen were drawing $700, fifteen were drawing $800 per year, and fourteen were drawing $900 per year. It will thus be seen that two-thirds of the clerks in this office were drawing less than $1,000 per year.

There is another view of this matter. A regular and general increase of salary would, in my judgment, in the end prove to be a very profitable policy for the Government. Clerks working at six hundred, seven hundred, eight hundred, and nine hundred dollars per year must necessarily regard their positions as temporary, to be abandoned when they can secure anything better outside, and many of them are securing better-paying positions. It takes some time and requires a large amount of attention on the part of the older clerks to make of green, inexperienced men, however naturally efficient they may be, valuable postal clerks, and the Department is annually losing a very large percentage of these clerks by reason of the policy of the Government in paying poor salaries and denying to this class of its employees promotions and increases of salary due them by every rule of business and justice.

In this connection I beg to quote from the postmaster at Omaha, Nebr., who, in an interview with him printed by the Omaha Bee on the 4th day of the past month, says that twenty-four of his clerks resigned during the past year and have been replaced with new, inexperienced men. This is nearly 25 per cent of his clerical force. He says:

> To get valuable service out of these recruits, who in many instances seek employment in the Government service under the impression that it is only play and no work, our best clerks must be detailed to teach them what they must do. A short trial and a new man must be taken in, and so the teaching business must be continued—so that the work in the office must be done by the loyal few, and I must require the clerks to work overtime, until the best ones, drawing only living pay, will become disgusted and leave.

Again he says:

> The low salaries are not economical. Inferior men, without any ambition to work and who will not study and learn the schemes because they do not care whether they keep their job or not, are costing the Government at least $1,000 a year for every necessary man in my service.
> For instance, I have thirty-two men in the mailing department. If sixteen of these men could do as well as four old-time clerks, who are spending much of their time in teaching recruits, I believe that the work could be done by the sixteen men—one-half of the present force. I do not mean by this that the men now in the department are ignorant or weak men. The only complaint is that they have not had the experience, and with the present salaries I can not expect to keep them long enough so that they may gain the experience. In short, the clerks are not paid enough, and every clerk in this Omaha office and every first-class office in the country ought to be paid as the carriers are paid—a sure advance each year up to a certain sum, not less than $1,000 for a year's work.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Would it embarrass the gentleman for me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like simply to add that the condition which exists apparently at the Omaha and San Francisco post-offices exists also in the post-offices in our large cities in the East. They have exactly the same complaint that their most competent clerks are leaving the service and going into mercantile employment owing to the small salary they receive.

Mr. HAYES. I thank the gentleman from New York. I have no reason to suppose that the post-office at Omaha is not a fair sample of the post-offices in other parts of the United States. The cure for these evils, in my judgment, is the inauguration of a policy of promotions and increases in salaries for all post-office clerks below a certain grade by regular yearly gradations, so as to give the clerk something to work for and to hope for, and I am certain that were such a policy inaugurated and properly carried out, the ultimate result would be not a large increase in the cost of the service, but a great increase in the efficiency of the clerks in the various first and second class post-offices in the United States, and a considerable decrease in the number employed.

I do not wish to be understood as denying that other departments of the service—for example, the carriers—have just claims which should receive the careful attention of this House, and if their claims are found to be just and proper, as some of them no doubt are, they should be generously provided for.

If it is already too late to change the policy of the Government or of this House, so far as the present bill is concerned, I wish to express the hope that when the post-office appropriation bill is framed for the fiscal year 1908 the committee may see its way clear to granting deserved and much-needed relief to the clerks in the first and second class offices of the United States by providing for compulsory promotion of all who receive less than a certain fixed sum, which sum should, I believe, be $1,000 in second-class and $1,200 in first-class offices.

When they understand the subject, both business considerations and sentiments of justice will cause the vast majority of the people of the United States to desire that we should not in effect by our failure to adequately legislate on this subject write over the entrance to every first and second class post-office in the land these words: "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, having under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill (H. R. 16953), which appropriates for the fiscal year 1907, $191,383,848.75, I wish to call attention to one or two items.

The Department's estimate for the fiscal year 1907 is $181,573,264. Of course this is only an estimate—it may be more or less. At any rate, there will be a deficit for the next year, but a considerable less amount than last year's deficit, which was more than $14,000,000. The Post-Office Department is, however, the only Department which is nearly self-sustaining, the revenue being derived from the amount of business done and paid by anyone and everyone who mails a letter or package.

In this connection, I want to say a few words relative to the rural free-delivery service—the only direct benefit the farming community derives from the Government without having to pay a hundred cents on the dollar for it. A joint resolution passed the Fifty-first Congress and was approved October 1, 1890, authorizing the Postmaster-General to test the free-delivery service in small towns and villages. We find in ex-Postmaster-General Wanamaker's report for the fiscal year 1901 that an experiment had been made in forty-six communities, with the result of showing an increase in seven months in the gross receipts of $5,506.10, as against the total cost of carriers of $4,320.60, leaving a net balance as profit to the Government of $850.50 and to the credit of the free-delivery service. We also find that ex-Postmaster-General Bissell, in his report for the fiscal year 1894, referring to the service, said:

> The experiment of free delivery in the forty-six towns and villages in which it was established about two years ago was continued during the fiscal year 1893–94, at a cost of $8,900.44. Nothing transpired during the year in connection with this service to cause me to change the opinion expressed in my last report against it. This service should be discontinued, or—granting, for the sake of argument, that the experiment has shown satisfactory results—should be extended to 40,000 other post-offices.

It was at this time that Congress discontinued the appropriation for this service. In the year 1896 it was that the first rural free-delivery routes were established, and then only as an experiment, as it was estimated it would require from forty to fifty million dollars per year to continue it. We also find in a statement taken from the last report of the Postmaster-General, showing the number of routes established and the amount of money expended from 1898 to 1905, as follows:

Year.	Total amount appropriated.	Total amount expended.	Number of routes in operation.
1898	$50,250.35	$50,241.06	148
1899	150,032.79	150,012.48	391
1900	450,000.00	420,433.17	1,276
1901	1,750,796.29	1,750,321.35	4,301
1902	4,089,075.20	4,089,041.71	8,402
1903	8,580,364.31	8,051,569.79	15,119
1904	12,926,905.44	12,645,275.79	24,566
1905	21,116,600.00	20,874,618.75	32,052
1906	25,828,300.00	----------	----------

You will see, Mr. Chairman, from this report that $20,874,618.75 was used to operate 32,055 rural routes, making an average cost for each carrier of $651.21. Now, then, each route serves approximately 100 families, making a total of 3,205,500 families served, at about a cost of $6.51 for each family. Just multiply this number by 5, which is a fair average for families in the rural districts, and the result will be you have 16,027,500 people served, at a cost of $20,874,618.75, or about $1.32 per capita. And, too, we have not made any allowance for the saving to the Government from the discontinuance of small postoffices and star routes where rural routes have been established in their stead, but it is safe to assert that, this feature taken into consideration, it would probably reduce the cost of operation to less than $1 per capita.

The number of carriers for city free-delivery service for 1905 was 21,778, at a cost of $20,919,078.13, or at the average rate of $960 for each carrier. Now, why this discrimination? The rural carrier is paid $720 per year and furnishes his own conveyances, feed for his horses, and receives, as stated, $720 per annum, or $60 per month.

Mr. STERLING. Do you know how much this appropriation would have to be increased in order to increase the pay of the rural carriers to $900 a year?

Mr. GRONNA. If you calculate the number of routes that we have to-day, it would take $4,000,000 to give each rural carrier an increase of $10 per month.

Mr. STERLING. Do you propose to offer an amendment to this bill to that effect?

Mr. GRONNA. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMYSER], I understand, has already offered an amendment. He has offered an amendment to increase the pay of the rural free-delivery carriers $10 per month, and I am in favor of that amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to what the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] and also the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMYSER] said on this question. I am glad to know that the East has among some of its ablest Representatives men who are friends of the farmers and who favor this measure.

I don't want you to figure this on the same basis as does the Massachusetts Republicans—that is, to have the farmer's products and all raw materials put on the free list and their own trust-made goods highly protected. It is not my wish to make a tariff speech just now, but I want to say (and with due respect for all of my colleagues), and in all candor and earnestness, that the farming interests, and especially the western industries, must be recognized and treated fairly. The farmer may be slow in exercising his rights, but he is, however, intelligent enough to know when he is being discriminated against.

Why should not our six million or more farmers, who from last year's production added to our national wealth $6,500,000,000, be entitled to the same consideration that the people in the cities receive. From 35 to 40 per cent of our entire population live on farms, and produced last year 2,708,000,000 bushels of corn, valued at $1,216,000,000; 684,000,000 bushels of wheat, valued at $525,000,000; $605,000,000 worth of hay; $138,000,000 worth of potatoes; $575,000,000 in cotton. We raised 939,000,000 bushels of oats, valued at $282,000,000; $138,000,000 worth of barley; $52,000,000 worth of tobacco; $50,000,000 worth of sugar cane and sugar beets. We produce every year from six to nine million pounds of rice, and why are we not entitled to the best mail service that will enable the farmer to get his daily market reports and papers promptly. The farmers, as a class, are the most intelligent people we have in our entire country, Our ablest men, men possessed of the strongest kind of character, have been reared and educated within the environments of the farm.

The expenditures of the postal service for the year 1905 are shown, by items, in the following statement:

You can readily see, Mr. Chairman, from this statement that the rural free-delivery carrier is being paid the lowest salary of anyone within the employ of the Government, and I ask that the carriers' pay be increased at least $10 per month or $120 per year. It would require only $4,000,000 for the entire service to grant them this increase.

The carrier in the city who does not require any conveyance (and if he does the Government pays for it) receives $960 per year, or $80 per month. Now, why this difference? The rural carrier has just as much responsibility, is just as intelligent, and is often compelled to travel in stormy weather, when in some localities his very life is in danger; still he is paid on an average of $20 less, saying nothing of his investment necessary for equipment. But you may say the city carrier does, in some instances, require horses and wagons, bicycles, or is compelled to travel on the street cars. That may be true, but does not this bill make an allowance of $725,000 for horse hire and $340,000 for car fare and bicycles, making a total of $1,065,000? Add to this $22,228,000 appropriated for city delivery service and you have a grand total of $23,293,000.

While I do not favor extravagance in the use of Government funds, I do believe it important that we should allow these carriers a fair and reasonable compensation, otherwise you can not hope to maintain this service which the farmers so highly appreciate and which adds to their comforts and benefits in many ways, enabling them to keep in touch with the balance of the world, literally speaking, in receiving their papers and magazines, which in themselves are an education.

So long as we continue to grant subsidies to railroad companies we should not preach economy. Why, this very bill, unless amended, appropriates $142,728.75 to trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans for necessary special facilities, and $25,000 to trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., for continuing necessary and special facilities.

Now, why first pay the railroads for carrying the mail and then grant them subsidies under the name of "special facilities?" We farmers do not ask for any subsidy. All we want is a fair and reasonable remuneration for our honest work.

I want to serve notice now that when this bill comes up for final passage this provision of the bill I shall oppose. I do not believe in these special privileges to any corporation, because it is the very means of creating trusts and monopolies at the expense of the common people. I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to array any one class against another; I am not here to advocate any special benefit for any industry that may be detrimental to any other industry and oppressive to the people. All I ask is that you grant us, in the spirit of fairness and justice, the same privileges, the same opportunities that you do to others. The American farmer, although the very backbone of our country, has never been unreasonable. He is always willing to give and take, but he does ask and does expect that honesty, fairness, and reasonableness shall prevail. I want to say further that so long as the people of the great State of North Dakota shall send me here as their Representative you must expect me to contend for their interests to the extent of my ability and power. Let us enact good, honest, wholesome laws, and then fearlessly enforce them. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, on Thursday of last week the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] promulgated certain charges against the watch companies of this country, and especially against the American Waltham Watch Company, located in the district in Massachusetts which I have the honor to represent. I propose to consider a few of those charges—not all of them; nor shall I be diverted to those I do not discuss, as the time allotted to me is entirely inadequate even to cover thoroughly the points I propose to take up here to-day.

The first charge made by the gentleman from Illinois, which he rolls as a sweet morsel beneath his tongue, is that the Waltham Watch Company and the other watch companies of this country are in a trust. Lest I may misrepresent the gentleman, I desire to call attention to his exact language in the RECORD, where he speaks upon this matter. He says:

I have in my possession some of the export catalogues issued by the American watch trust—by the Keystone company and by the Waltham company and by the rest of them.

Then further on, when my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] stated that he was a stockholder in the Waltham Company, and that he had never heard that that company was connected with any trust, the gentleman from Illinois refers him to the Ways and Means Committee for information upon that subject, and then a little later on he reiterated what he said upon that point, adding that when a certain consignment of watches which had been sent over from Europe to this country arrived at the port here, he adds in connection with that matter:

When they reached the custom-house in New York they were met by the agents of the watch trust; and I use the term advisedly, in spite of the fact that we have a plutocrat in this House who, by his own admission, is a holder of large blocks of stock in that trust.

Now, I hold in my hand a circular letter which has just been issued by the Waltham Watch Company and signed by E. C. Fitch, the president, and Royal Robbins, treasurer of that company, men of character, men of probity, men of the highest honor, men who are leaders and captains of industry in our section of the country, men who would not attach their names to a statement unless it was absolutely true. Now, let me read to you what these men say on that very point.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. From what paper is the gentleman about to read?

Mr. TIRRELL. This is the Boston Advertiser, of April 7, 1906, and the same statement is also published in other papers in Boston of the same date. They say:

First, we wish most emphatically to state that, so far as we know or are concerned, there is no watch trust in the United States and there never has been. The various American companies are, so far as we have any knowledge, absolutely independent, and operate entirely and solely with regard to their own separate interests. This is not only the condition here to-day, but has always been so.

Now, do you suppose that these men will attach their signatures to a statement like that, to be circulated and disseminated all over this country, unless it is absolutely true? And do you not believe that these men know whether their own company is in a trust? And would they not be likely to know, in the acute competition that there is in the watch business in this country, and, indeed, throughout the world to-day, whether there is any watch company in this country in any trust?

Now, I take up the second allegation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], which is that while there are, he says, 15 per cent (and I do not know where he gets that figure), while there are 15 per cent more men employed in the watch factories of this country than there were in 1880, yet the character of the labor employed has deteriorated, because there are more women and 200 per cent more children employed in the watch factories of the country than there were twenty years ago.

Now, I read to you from the letter of the president and treasurer of the Waltham Watch Company upon that particular point, in which they say:

The Waltham company never employed children in any capacity whatever. On the other hand, the employment of children in watch manufacturing is common in Switzerland. In spite of this fact, a recent slight advance in Swiss wages was promptly followed by an increase in the price of Swiss watches throughout their home market.

But I am not relying on the statement of the American Watch Company to corroborate what I have said. I hold in my hand the census bulletin issued May 21, 1902, giving full particulars in regard to the watch industry of this country, and on the fourth page thereof I read as follows:

There are practically no children employed in the industry.

Then, in searching over the tables in this bulletin, I find that in all the establishments throughout the whole of the United States engaged in the manufacture of watches there are at the present time just twenty-six persons employed who are under 16 years of age.

Then go back to the statistics of twenty years ago, and I find there were twenty-four employed. You can not find, in my judgment, a manufacturing industry in this country, and possibly in the world, where there are so few in comparison with the entire number of employees who are under 16 years of age, for there are employed of men alone in the watch industry in this country 6,880 persons.

Now, I take up the third charge made by the gentleman from Illinois, and that is that the tariff has not been instrumental in increasing the wages of employees in the watch factories in this country. In regard to that I have here the statement made by the American Watch Company that the wages paid in our watch factories in the United States are from two and one-half to three times the wages paid to the Swiss workmen. There are 40,000 people employed in the manufacture of watches in Switzerland. Those 40,000 people produce 40 watches apiece a year. We are employing in our watch factories 6,880 and in collateral branches of the business 3,000 or 4,000 more, in round numbers 10,000 people, and we produce in this country to each one of these employees 250 watches a year.

The statement made by the gentleman from Illinois that there has been no substantial increase under the fostering influences of our tariff in the development of the watch industry in this country is contradicted in toto by the census bulletin to which I have referred, for I find that the total value of the assets in the watch business in this country in 1870 was $2,686,133, and in 1900 it was $14,235,191, an increase of over 500 per cent. Not only that, but I find by still further investigation that the business has so increased that our exportation of watches to foreign lands during this same period has rolled up 180 per cent, while there has been a decrease of the imports of foreign watches of 53.5 per cent all along the line.

Now, as to the amount of wages paid. The wages of the women employed in the watch factories of this country year after year, not allowing for a single holiday, not allowing for any stoppage of the business or any breakdown or depression in the trade, the average earnings of the women employed in the watch factories in this country is almost $400 a year, or $385. Just think of that! If you take out the days when the factory must necessarily be stopped for repairs for certain periods during this long lapse of years since 1880, when statistics began, then you will have the facts as stated in the census bulletin, that the women in the factories are receiving nearly $400 a year. Duplicate that, if you can, in any other industry either in a foreign country or in our own land.

What are the wages of the men in the watch factories returned in the same manner? Seven hundred dollars a year is their average wage. So, then, we have this condition of things—an industry which in its capitalization has increased 500 per cent, and since the protective tariff policy of the Republican party has been in operation an increase of foreign exportation of 180 per cent, and wages two and a half to three times that paid in Switzerland to-day, and the employment of the large amount of capital, adding to the taxable assets of the country what I have stated.

There is one more charge—because in my limited time I can not dwell upon these things as I want to—and that is the charge that the American watches are sold cheaper in foreign markets than here. It seems that my friend from Illinois must be strangely ignorant of the economic and business principles which govern all our American manufactures in placing their products in foreign lands. I want to illustrate this by a concrete example with which I am conversant. I am interested as trustee in the manufacture of wood pulp, representing as trustee one of the largest mills in this country. This is an industry of which we knew comparatively little twenty-five years ago.

Our pulp mills, except the outer walls, have been remodeled and torn to pieces twice during that time, but the ingenuity and genius of the American people in a very few years placed it on a permanent basis, and not only upon a permanent basis, but enabled them to manufacture pulp in such quantities that it was impossible to place the whole of our pulp here. Now, when any manufacturing industry produces more than the home market can consume one of two things inevitably follows. You must either shut down your factory until that surplus supply which has accumulated in the warehouses has been disposed of in the domestic market or else you must sell it abroad. Now, if you sell your product abroad——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIRRELL. I do.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will it profit the home industry to sell a manufactured product abroad cheaper than it costs to produce it and ship it abroad?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes, sir; in some cases it will; and if I have time enough I will demonstrate that here by my own practical experience in business, which is the experience of other manufacturers in other industries. It has to be done if you keep your factories open. The factories which produce more than the domestic demand can take care of——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. How will it pay the home industry to sell it at less to the foreigner abroad?

Mr. TIRRELL. I will show exactly how it can be done. Now, wait one moment, gentlemen, and I will illustrate it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman answers that question, because I desire to ask another in that connection which is cognate or akin to it—if you reach that stage of production where you have produced a surplus which it pays you to sell at less than it cost rather than close down your factory for a time, why should you ship that surplus to the foreign market to benefit the foreign consumer rather than sell to the American consumer at less than the cost? In other words, why should you give the foreigner the benefit of that surplus production rather than give it to your own people?

Mr. TIRRELL. In making that remark the gentleman knows very little in regard to the pulp business I am talking about—a great business which produces the paper which is put into our books and magazines—because, now, sir, the margin of profit is so small upon paper and pulp that it is a slight fraction of a per cent, and it is only by the manufacture of an enormous quantity of output, and running your factory day and night, that the paper makers and the pulp makers of this country can make even a modest dividend, and most of them during the past ten or fifteen years have been running on such a small margin as to make no dividend at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman does not seem to have understood my question.

Mr. TIRRELL. If I can only get ten or fifteen minutes I will answer it fully, Mr. WILLIAMS; but I ought not to be diverted, as I said in the first place; I am only allowed a very short time, but I will try to illustrate it to you. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I would be very glad to answer questions, but only being allowed five minutes I must conclude at that time unless my time is further extended, which I shall be glad to have done to answer these questions. I want now to attempt to illustrate why the manufacturers do that thing and why it is necessary to do that thing. Now, we will suppose, for example, a pulp mill costs $1,000,000. We will suppose that they manufacture 25 per cent more than can be disposed of in this country, which is practically the case in regard to that industry. Now, then, that 25 per cent must lie in the warehouse until it is sold at a small fraction of a profit and the mill be closed up or else it must be sent abroad and sold at some price over there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not sell it at some price here?

Mr. TIRRELL. Wait a minute, sir. The demand and supply makes a very small margin of profit, and do you ask that the American manufacturer in our own country shall sell his product at a loss? Is he not entitled to a small margin of profit, instead of going and dumping all of his surplus product on the market and lowering the whole price of that manufacture?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not ask him to sell at a less price than he does elsewhere.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, the reason why that is done is this: The fixed charges on the plant are running all the time. We will suppose the plant cost $1,000,000. Now, it is idle, say, for two and one-half months. The fixed charges are running on; the price of everything is running on; all except the day labor is running on. The manufacturer's cost is increased by the mill lying idle in that way with all of these fixed charges running on and no product being obtained from the mill. So that if the accumulated surplus is sold in this country two results will follow. First, the home market being fully supplied purchases will not be made, that surplus can not be placed unless it is sold at a reduced price, which means, in the case to which I am alluding, at less than cost. Second, the mill will soon have to be shut down again, for it is the surplus above the home demand of which we are speaking, and the market having been already supplied here at home with all the product it can handle, and the manufacturer producing 25 per cent more than the home market can handle, it is inevitable that the mill must close until its production again corresponds with the demand. Thus its wage employees are thrown out of employment and the manufacturing cost largely increased under the condition suggested by the able and versatile gentleman from Mississippi.

The American manufacturer, when he produces more than the country requires, in order to make this small margin of profit has got to keep his mill going day and night in many industries. He must do so in the case I have cited. It is the only way he can make money and pay any dividend whatever, because the shutting down of his mill entails a large loss on account of the conditions attached to the business, and in order that he may do this and meet expenditures the American manufacturer sells his surplus product at some price upon the other side.

Now, when he first goes into a new country, when the people do not know the character of our goods abroad, they sell them for a loss, but when their establishments are planted in Belgium, England, and other countries they make a fair profit; and if you read that circular of the Waltham company, which I propose to have published in the RECORD, you will find they do the same thing over there when they are establishing their trade. They do not at first make a profit on their goods. It is only where they are seeking to establish trade, where they have got to compete against conditions that exist, where there are different kinds of credit and difference in methods of sale, and difference in transportation, difference in method of carrying on the business, and where these things must be overcome, and can not be overcome unless you put the prices on your goods so low that the people will buy anyway, on the theory that men will buy where they can buy the cheapest, that this course is pursued; only in such cases are goods sold at or under cost. But after the trade is established, after the houses are planted, after they have obtained salesmen who speak the language to sell the goods, after they have gotten over the difficulties of the transportation question, and after the American product has become firmly fixed in the approval of the people by the use of the article introduced in this way, then it is not necessary, for the foreign purchaser will then buy the goods anyway, and the American manufacturer gets a profit.

Mr. STERLING. They do the same thing in this country in localities wherever they introduce their business.

Mr. TIRRELL. Certainly; that can be easily demonstrated, and that is the reason, and the only reason, why the American manufacturer ever sells at less than cost abroad. It is to establish its trade; it is to fill up a gap, so that he can keep his mill running, so that he can sell the domestic product here at home at a small margin, as he is obliged to do with the acute competition that exists in the United States.

This is the course the Waltham company has followed. That it results as I have stated is evidenced by the fact that that company states that manufacturers and merchants doing an export business must necessarily make considerable price reductions to induce foreign buyers to substitute the new for the old, emphatically, however, asserting that Waltham watches are not sold, except in such cases as I have called attention to, at lower prices than those prevailing here.

Germany, whose wonderful industrial development since Bismarck abandoned his free-trade propaganda and advocated a protective tariff has excited the wonder of the world, has conspicuously followed this practice. It will not soon be forgotten by many of us who heard the debate on Cuban reciprocity in the Fifty-seventh Congress, how that was illustrated by the sugar schedule, by which, in order to dispose of their surplus sugar abroad, so low an export price was fixed in Germany that the home price was about double the foreign and bounties and differentials were paid to equalize the trade.

I do not approve of a policy that would increase the price to the home consumer like that; such a policy is sacrificing a home market for a foreign. It illustrates, however, the extremity to which Germany has gone to secure our trade. It proves that our export trade can not be limited by the prices and terms that govern at home. How much wiser and more farsighted the American policy that sells here its products on small margins and great output, disposing of its surplus in such a manner as to insure a permanent business abroad. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TIRRELL. I ask unanimous consent to insert the circular letter of the Waltham Watch Company in reply to the address made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and also leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

"NO WATCH TRUST EXISTS"—WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY ISSUES REFUTATION—SAYS THE ATTACK ON OUR TARIFF WAS INSTIGATED—SWISS POLICY IS TO INJURE UNITED STATES INDUSTRY—FOREIGN MARKET MUST BE HELD TO OFFSET DULL TIMES.

In view of the various articles which have appeared of late in the public press, more or less openly in the guise of advertisements, we feel it advisable to depart from our usual policy and to make a brief statement of the actual conditions which govern the watch industry to-day.

In the first place, we wish most emphatically to state that, so far as we know or are concerned, there is no watch trust in the United States, and there never has been. The various companies manufacturing watch movements in the United States are, so far as we have any knowledge, absolutely independent each of the other, and operate entirely and solely with regard to their own separate, individual interests. This, we repeat, is not only the condition of affairs to-day, but has always been so.

Secondly, as to the export business. We are the largest exporters of watches in the world, and we are proud of the fact. At a dinner recently given in Cairo, Egypt, to a number of Egyptian officials and prominent American representatives it was stated by the president of one of the greatest and most successful mechanical industries of the United States that the American Waltham Watch Company had done as much if not more than any other company to educate the people of the world to an appreciation of the excellence of articles of American manufacture. For more than a quarter of a century it has been the effort of this company to push the sale of American Waltham watches in all parts of the world, thereby demonstrating for the first time that a thoroughly accurate and reliable timepiece can be made and supplied at a price within the reach of everyone. The ability to do so is owing wholly to the superiority of the American workmen and the invention of automatic tools and improved methods.

It can be readily understood that this great exploitation of American watches in foreign countries has necessarily interfered to a large extent with the conditions formerly existing in those countries, and especially with the Swiss watch industry. In retaliation the Swiss manufacturers of watches have combined to combat our competition in every possible way, and have, as we are reliably informed, subscribed a large sum of money to influence public opinion in the United States, and have not hesitated to employ somewhat questionable methods to injure the American watch industry, with which they are entirely unable to compete fairly, either at home or abroad, quality for quality and price for price.

At present this foreign syndicate is attempting to regain the ground already so thoroughly lost in the United States by means of a cry of exorbitant profits by American manufacturers and dealers. Curiously enough, they simultaneously endeavor to influence retail dealers to sell Swiss watches by the sole argument that the dealers can thus obtain much higher profits. These the dealers are, in fact, able to obtain in many instances for the reason that the Swiss manufacturers are prepared to supply to the retail dealers watch movements without any trade-mark or other distinguishing characteristics, thereby making it impossible for the intending purchaser to tell what the quality really is, or to ascertain the actual value of the watch. The dealers are thus enabled to sell a Swiss watch of unknown and inferior quality at a price much higher than they would be able to obtain for an American watch of well-known grade and trade-mark and of a better quality. A similar high profit can not be obtained in American watches for the reason that the trade-marks, grades, and approximate prices are so well known to the public. In the instance where well-known and high-class Swiss trade-marked watches are dealt in, the sale is confined to one leading house in each city, so that there shall be no competition, and a profit, frequently as high as 100 per cent, can be secured for a timepiece no better than and often not as good as an American watch costing half the money.

In spite of the various devices employed by them to bring about a large retail profit in the sale of their own watches, the European manufacturers in the attacks recently instigated on the tariff have laid much stress on our contract plan for the selling of railroad watches.

This brings up the entire question of the necessity of profit for the dealer. Conditions governing the sale of watches are radically different from those obtaining in other branches of trade. The seller of a watch is expected by the purchaser to be responsible for it as long as he lives or is in business. Week after week, month after month, the wearer expects to have it regulated, compared with standard time, and adjusted, generally without charge. All this costs the retailer time and money. Watch buyers desire to have the advice and personal care of the best and most expert watchmakers they can find, and it takes years for a good mechanic to acquire the necessary education and experience. The dealer, therefore, is entitled to a fair profit, and we do not think the American public is disposed to approve the efforts of Swiss manufacturers to prevent his getting it except in their own goods. The trick is too transparent to be good tactics.

It is well understood among all manufacturers and merchants doing export business and introducing new and unknown articles into a foreign market that it is necessary to make very considerable price reductions in order to induce the merchants of that country to substitute the new for the old. This does not mean, however, that the article costs the consumer any less than he pays for the home product, the difference being that added inducements are given by the manufacturer to the foreign merchant for his time and effort in introducing the goods. It is a fact that Waltham watches are not sold to the consumer abroad at lower prices than those prevailing in this country, although in order to introduce them abroad the company is obliged sometimes in the first instance to make somewhat lower prices to the dealers. This condition of affairs is due partly to the reasons given above, and even more largely to the fact that dealers in foreign countries are used to the larger profits which prevail in the Old World, and are unwilling to spend time and effort to substitute a new article at less profit.

A word as to the respective conditions of wage and labor cost here and abroad. Although the products of the Waltham company have to meet in foreign markets the watches of Switzerland on even terms, the wages paid at Waltham are the highest in the world, and are from two and a half to three times the average pay received by the Swiss workmen.

There are many more men employed to-day by the Waltham company than ever before, and at higher wages. There are also more women employed, and at higher wages. The Waltham company does not, and never did, employ children in any capacity whatever. On the other hand, the employment of children in watch manufacturing is common in Switzerland. In spite of this fact, a recent slight advance in Swiss wages was promptly followed by an increase in the price of Swiss watches throughout their home markets.

Although the Waltham company has been steadily reducing prices during the past two years, wages have never been so high at Waltham as at the present time.

It should also be stated that the establishment of a foreign market is necessary in order to safeguard an industry at home. In periods of depression a manufacturer can, by selling an important part of his product abroad, keep his shops open and his workmen employed at home until the time of stagnation is over. Without the foreign market, which is not available unless previously developed, his only alternative would be to shut down his works and throw his people out of employment. In other words, the establishment of this foreign market furnishes an outlet which provides steady work for the American wage-earner.

If the manufacturer does not have a foreign outlet, the injury falls, not upon him alone, but upon his employees; for in the absence of such outlet, in case of hard times or a lessened demand, he must curtail his production and to just this degree throw his people out of work. With his foreign market established he can keep his shops open until the return of good times or of increasing home demand. An illustration of this situation can be found in our own experience during the panic of 1893 and 1894. If it had not been for our foreign trade we should have been completely shut down, but by the help of our foreign outlet our works remained open during this generally disastrous period, while our competitors who had not established for themselves a foreign market were, in most instances, obliged to stop running.

The foreign manufacturer, whose own home market we are thus invading, is in the strange attitude of professing indignation at the prices at which our watches are sold in the United States at the same moment that he is making every effort to regain his lost footing here by offering 100 per cent profits to the retailer at the expense of the public.

The products of the Waltham company reach the consumer at a fair profit to the dealer, and are sold, both at home and abroad, at as low prices as are consistent with high quality and a rate of wages unequaled in the world.

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
By E. C. FITCH, President.
ROYAL ROBBINS, Treasurer.

BOSTON, April 6, 1906.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to occupy some of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the address which we have just heard is one of the most important that has been made to this House; and I wish to call attention to it. It is the first time that there has been a fair and a frank confession and an attempted defense of this actual existing condition—of the fact that American manufacturers habitually sell cheaper to foreign than to American consumers. The gentleman attempts to explain the condition in a way that has been attempted before, when the explanation was not, however, coupled with the confession of its existence, but strangely coupled with a denial. The gentleman contends that we ship abroad to sell cheaper than we do at home only the surplus products of his particular form of manufacture. The inference is that this surplus theory is to be the keynote of Republican defense of this entire system of selling cheaper abroad than at home. After having said that, and after having undertaken to demonstrate that the system of selling a surplus abroad cheaper than at home is necessary in order to keep the American factory running, he was then asked this question: "But suppose that having reached the stage of production where it pays you to sell part of your product—'the surplus'—at a loss rather than to close down your factory temporarily, why is it that you sell that surplus abroad—abroad only, and not at home—at less than cost?" [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] That question the gentleman has not answered, and that question the gentleman never will answer, because the gentleman dares not answer it. Now, I will answer it for him. I will tell you why it is only abroad that he and others sell their surplus cheaper than cost. Granting, for the sake of argument, that the need to dispose of a surplus is the real underlying reason for the system—and we all know, as a matter of fact, in a majority of cases it is not, because in a great many products they have been carrying on the system for six, eight, ten, or twelve years; and no man, gentlemen, will sell for a series of five, ten, or twelve years at a loss abroad or anywhere else. But, for the sake of argument, admit that they sell only the surplus, and that it is sold cheaper than cost, which is also a doubtful if not a demonstrably incorrect statement, why is it sold abroad only? Why can not the American consumer have some of the benefit?

I will tell you. It is here at home, with a sheltered market; sheltered by the tariff for the planting and growth and fruitage of combinations between manufacturers—I will not use the word "trust," because it seems a red flag in the eyes of a great many people—that the combination rendered possible by the tariff exists. Their price agreements extend only to the home market. The so-called "surplus" in America is only a surplus at the agreed price; at a less price there would be no "surplus." The moment he undertook to sell the surplus at home at less than the agreed price he would break the market—he would break the prices agreed upon by the various factories entering into the combination. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will give the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the moment that set in, then the hope that the Republican party has held out to the American people, that in the long run protection would not increase the price of living to the consumer, would be a hope possible of realization. Competition would really set in among home producers of the given article. Each member of the combination would proceed to sell in competition with the other members of the combination, and the American people would first get their products cheaper, and ultimately get them absolutely cheap.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, there is the gist of it. Why do they sell the surplus abroad only, cheaper than the scale price? Why don't they give us the surplus, and give the foreigner, under the benefit of whose laws their industry has not been created and made prosperous at their expense—why don't you give us the benefit of the surplus prices; to us who by our laws have enabled you, at our expense, to be more prosperous than you ever otherwise would have been, and give the foreigner "the real thing?" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have thought it well, Mr. Chairman, to call attention in this brief way to this vital point of omission in the gentleman's argument. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, in the brief remarks that I shall make I will not attempt to cover the wide field with reference to the subject of the special mail appropriation, which has been so ably covered by the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of that proposition; but I deem it proper as a Representative of the city of New Orleans, whose people believe themselves largely benefited by that legislation, that I should say a few words in its behalf.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill making appropriations for service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, contains an appropriation which the report of the committee correctly states is similar to those made for a series of years in former acts, as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

APPROPRIATION HAS PRECEDENTS.

The amount of this appropriation is not large. It is indeed very small compared with the aggregate of the bill, which carries appropriations largely in excess of $191,300,000. It affects the business interests of New York and other great commercial cities and centers of the East, to whom it is deeply important to have speedy mail and freight communication with the South and Southwest. It concerns the banker, broker, manufacturer, and the ordinary dealer. To the commercial cities and people of the South living on or near this great trunk line and the branch or lateral railroads connecting with it and profiting by this speedy mail communication this appropriation possesses the greatest possible value.

They do not share in the comparatively small payment made to carry it out, for hardly any of them, I believe, are stockholders in these railroads, but they do share in the great benefit of speedy mail communication. Hence it is that whenever this appropriation has been assailed or menaced the intelligent commercial bodies of the southern cities have come to the rescue and urged that this appropriation should not be disturbed. This interest is felt in a marked degree in the city I represent, but I do not believe that the interest of New Orleans in the policy now pursued is any greater than that of Atlanta or other communities lying on the line of route described in the appropriation.

The appropriation proposed follows the language of former appropriation acts, and it is hard to see how it could be more carefully guarded than it is. It is for "special facilities" on "trunk lines"—that is to say, for extra speed and quicker delivery. It is not merely for "special" facilities, but for "necessary" facilities. Nor is it an absolute appropriation, where the money is to be spent, right or wrong. The money is only to be spent if the Postmaster-General is convinced that it is "necessary for the interest of the public service."

I submit that the making of the appropriations from year to year, in spite of the most violent opposition in Congress, amounts to a very strong expression of opinion by the two Houses of Congress that this appropriation is necessary in order to secure "special" facilities for the postal service, and that this opinion of Congress ought to have great weight with the head of the Department. I think, further, that the Postmaster-General, however able and enlightened, might well deem the unanimous judgment of the bankers, merchants, shippers, and other business men of the South in respect to the value and necessity of this service a point well worthy of his consideration. Still, the responsibility is devolved upon the head of the Department of taking final action, and if this payment were an abuse, as has been most absurdly alleged, or were a mere gratuity to one or two trunk railroad lines, he could correct it.

It has happened time and time again in the history of this Government that Congress has made appropriations for this or that object and the Executive has refused to spend the money. I refer especially to river and harbor bills. It is true, indeed, that the people of the Southern States have a friendly feeling for the great railroad lines whose successful administration is so important to their growth and prosperity; but if only the railroad interest were involved, they would not be found demanding this appropriation as earnestly as they do.

REMARKABLE BENEFITS.

I do not believe there is an appropriation contained in this act where the same amount of money accomplishes a larger amount of benefit to millions of people. I am amazed that the reformer, seeking to restore this Government to its pristine simplicity, purity, and economy, should run through our great annual appropriations of six or seven hundred millions of dollars and pounce on this little appropriation of $171,000 in order to signalize his zeal and vigilance. Yet the debates on this paragraph have been protracted at every session of Congress since I have been in this Hall.

DISCUSSED FULLY IN EVERY CONGRESS.

This subject was fully discussed at the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, and among others by myself. In my brief remarks on former occasions I referred to the appeals to continue this service coming up from the business men and commercial bodies of New Orleans and the whole country tributary to New Orleans. I stated then that these gentlemen had studied this question; knew their own interests. New Orleans is the second exporting city of the country, and entitled to best facilities. We now have three double fast mail trains from New York where we had one before. Under the bill the Postmaster-General regulates the schedules, and these are regulated, not by the convenience and interests of the railroads, but by the public interests.

It appeared in former debates that these appropriations for "special" facilities, which began as far back as 1875, had been kept up every year, and in a number of years had largely exceeded the appropriation which was then contemplated or the sum now to be appropriated. It was stated in debate that no Postmaster-General save Mr. Wanamaker had ever antagonized this appropriation. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. J. Lowrie Bell, had reported (see RECORD of April 24, 1894, p. 4045) that the present mail schedules were "improvements over those which have heretofore been enforced."

I think it safe to say that the present schedules are an improvement on anything that went before over this important artery of commerce and mail communication, although the amount appropriated is smaller than in 1894.

Mr. Chairman, it has been boldly asserted in this House in these discussions that the mail service to the South as now rendered would be continued without this special appropriation. There is no authority for this statement.

AUGMENTED MAIL SERVICE.

I think it requires a great deal of hardihood for a Member to rise in this House and assert that the mail facilities of the people of the South and Southwest have not been greatly augmented over the former system.

In the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress Mr. Swanson, of Virginia, stated that the time for a letter to come from New York to Danville (his own town) had been reduced from eighteen hours and fifteen minutes to thirteen hours and thirty-five minutes, a saving of five hours. The time to Atlanta from New York has been cut down from thirty-three hours to twenty-four hours and twenty minutes, a saving of about eight and one-half hours. The gain between New York and Tampa was then about fifteen hours, and the whole Cuban mail goes that way. Such was the showing made for this improved service in March, 1898, and since that period a still further saving of hours has been made between New York and New Orleans and intermediate points by reason of the faster service established since then.

I remind you of the fact that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company had this subsidy, as you call it, for a while and then threw it up as unprofitable. They were not willing to come up to the Department requirements. If it was a needless subsidy—a mere job—why did they throw it away? In this fact you have a pretty good indication of what we may have to expect if this appropriation be stopped. We shall have one fast mail and passenger train, perhaps, in twenty-four hours to New Orleans—what we used to have in old times. The whole country from Washington via Danville, Atlanta, Montgomery, and other points, with their lateral connections, will have to suffer the evils of a disarrangement of their mail communications and of a tardy, infrequent service.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that in the zeal to strike down this very small appropriation an effort has been made to show that the Post-Office Department is opposed to it and that the Department is authority for the statement that if this appropriation be withdrawn the eight or ten Southern States affected by it will still get as rapid and frequent mail communication as they have to-day. The Department has never put itself on record as saying anything of the kind. It has borne testimony, as I have shown you, to the great improvement in this mail service from New York, via Atlanta, to New Orleans, and to the fact of there being three fast mail trains per day where there used to be only one. In the extended debate had in the Senate some years ago, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Sullivan] quoted the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in reply to his specific inquiry whether the Department could secure the service as "prompt and frequent" without the so-called subsidy as with it. The response was:

I regret to say that I can not give a specific answer as to what we will be able to do. It is an open question.

It would have been a very extraordinary statement, indeed, if the Post-Office Department had reported that without this appropriation and authority they could have secured as prompt and efficient mail service for this Southern country as they have to-day. The answer would have been made at once. Why, then, have you been spending this money in the past unless you deemed the expenditure "necessary to promote the interest of the postal service."

The law made that fact a condition, a test of the expenditure.

SOUTHERN CONDITIONS.

Again, we know that the railroads in the South are now under different conditions from those in the North. There are few large cities with us, and the country is sparsely settled. It does not pay to run fast passenger trains. The additional fast mail train a day requires a special expenditure. The train starting from New York at 4.30 a. m. leaves at an hour when no passengers can be expected. They will naturally wait for the afternoon train.

This early train does, however, take the mails of New England, New York City and State, and all the mails over this long route are expedited.

There are few Members in this House, from the East and North especially, who do not know the great value of time in the forwarding and reception of letters, and while their constituents may not be generally interested in this appropriation, many business men in the East will be apt to inquire how and why this appropriation should be singled out for special attack.

It is a melancholy fact that this contest should be renewed every year and that the people of eight or ten Southern States should be forced to fight for this slight recognition in the benefits of a common Government. It is somewhat in contrast with the policy which calls on the South forty years after the close of the civil war to bear her share of the taxation involved in a grand pension system of $150,000,000 per annum. The appropriation is called a "subsidy." That word does not frighten me at all. I am not afraid to vote for fair and just appropriations for all parts of the country.

NOT A POSTAL ABUSE.

There may be abuses, possibly great abuses, in your postal expenditures, but this is not one of them.

I had the honor of entering this body in the Fifty-second Congress. Among the first debates I encountered was with reference to this special mail facility between Boston, New York, and New Orleans. In every session since that time we have heard the same arguments in opposition, and in spite of it each and every Congress has declared in favor of these facilities. I submit that this concurrence of action by every Congress should convince even those opposed to it that there must be indisputable merit in the proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MEYER. Yes, for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there anything in the record upon which that appropriation is based—any testimony, any estimate, or anything else?

Mr. MEYER. We may not have direct testimony, but I would refer to the testimony of Postmaster-General Shallenberger, who answered in response to this question as follows, as reported in recent hearings:

Mr. MOON. Let me come down to the hard bottom question of administration; do you want this money or not?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We are not asking it or expressing an opinion in reference to it.
Mr. MOON. What is the reason you are silent on that question?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We are not silent.
Mr. MOON. You say you do not ask it.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We do not ask for it.
Mr MOON. What is the reason you do not ask for it?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Because we think the effect on the service at large is better if we do not select any particular route.
Mr. MOON. Then you do not select it because you think that it is a bad example, and has a bad effect on the railway mail service?
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman has before him that he is reading from, but I have a little fuller quotation than that.

Mr. MEYER. I hope the gentleman will be brief, because my time is limited.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to show that the Post-Office Department said that they do not want it, but they consider the action of Congress mandatory.

Mr. MEYER. If the action of Congress is mandatory in making the appropriation, is it not a fact that the second provision of same paragraph declares with equal strength and equal positiveness that "no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service?"

Now, I submit that if the first part of this provision making the appropriation is mandatory, the provision is equally strong and explicit, equally mandatory, that the Postmaster-General shall not expend any part of the money unless he deems it necessary in the interests of the postal service. Since I have been in Congress, we have had two Democratic Congresses and five Republican. We have had as Postmasters-General Mr. Bissell, of New York; Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, both Democrats. We have had as Republicans, Mr. Gary, of Maryland; Mr. Smith, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Payne, of Wisconsin; Mr. Wynne, and now Mr. Cortelyou. Now, can it be argued that all of these gentlemen, able officials, men as conscientious, no doubt, as we are, would expend this money year after year, constantly having before them this provision that "no part shall be expended unless it is deemed necessary for the interests of the postal service?" I do not believe that anyone will impute any such disregard of the intent of the law to these distinguished officials.

Now, further, my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], to whose very able argument I listened with great interest a few days since, bases the entire fabric of that argument upon the theory that we will have these fast mail trains whether the special sum is appropriated or not. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no evidence to prove that, or anything like it. On the contrary, we have before us the letter received from Mr. Andrews, the vice-president of the Southern Railway, stating specifically that fast mail train No. 97 would not be run unless they received the extra compensation. It would not pay the company to run them on the schedules now current. Relying upon this statement, his entire proposition must fall.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, my friend misunderstands the letter. He does not say the train will not run, but that they will not run the train on this particular schedule.

Mr. MEYER. But this is the core of the matter, because this particular schedule is what we want.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But he does not threaten to take off the train.

Mr. MEYER. Further, I received a telegram, without any conference or communication on my part, from Mr. Wickersham, president of the Atlanta and West Point Railroad, in which he says:

Atlanta and West Point will discontinue present fast mail train known as "No. 97" should Congress discontinue present appropriation for special facilities, for the reason it is of no advantage to local travel, making few stops and between unseasonable hours. Through travel is not sufficient to justify continuing train exclusively for accommodating passengers, there being no passenger connection with other lines at Atlanta. The train is paying about 40 cents per train mile, exclusive of Government appropriation. We can accommodate our passenger traffic satisfactorily without this train. It does not create new business, but detracts correspondingly from earnings of other trains. Also makes it necessary to operate an east-bound train for the purpose of returning mail equipment.

Mr. Wickersham, as is well known, is a gentleman of the highest character and integrity, whose statements are worthy of all credence.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we can not afford to incur the risk of discontinuing this appropriation in the face of what has been stated by the railroad officials. I believe that they are sincere in their statements. I see no reason why they should attempt to deceive us. The amount involved is too small to warrant them in employing these statements as a "bluff," as some gentleman has intimated recently.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. MEYER. With pleasure, but just for a moment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It occurs to me that the gentleman who sent you that telegram was under the impression the only pay that train got came from this special appropriation. Now, I ask the gentleman this question: If the great amount of mail matter which you have just stated this train carries into New Orleans does not show that under the regular statutory pay that train is of enormous profit to the railroad?

Mr. MEYER. Well, I do not care to discuss that. I am not sufficiently posted as to what it pays.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I mean exclusive of the subsidy.

Mr. MEYER. This gentleman knows what he is talking about. He is the president of two railroads and stands very high in the community in which he lives, the city of Atlanta, and knows whether it pays him or not and what it pays him. I have no reason in the world to question the correctness of his statement, especially as the amount which his road receives as his proportion is scarcely enough to warrant him to jeopardize his reputation as a man of truth and veracity. He certainly would not make an incorrect statement, which he might reasonably expect would be quoted on the floor of this House.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But however honest he may be—and I am not impugning or reflecting upon his integrity—does not the telegram itself show that he was under the impression that this subsidy or special appropriation was the only pay that train got, when the very fact shows that it must get an enormous pay from the regular rates?

Mr. MEYER. I can not conceive, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Wickersham is ignorant of the proportion of the so-called subsidy his roads receive.

Mr. SMALL. May I say to the gentleman that there is no evidence here that the amount of pay received is excessive except the statement of the gentleman? There is absolutely nothing from the record, no evidence that would be conclusive upon the fact, and I would ask the gentleman further if the question of the necessity of this appropriation does not depend upon this, that this is necessary to maintain these schedules, not the amount they are getting now? If they are getting too much, that is to be remedied in another way and at another time. I would ask the gentleman if that is not the situation?

Mr. MEYER. In my judgment, that is the situation.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The fact is, as I stated to my colleague yesterday in arguing that certain roads had got too much because of the great amount of traffic they carried, if this should be one of those roads why should it not be eliminated?

Mr. SMALL. That is a mere matter of conjecture that the gentleman is making.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It is based upon your argument of yesterday.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to enter into further specific details. I will simply refer to this fact, that of all the great appropriations that are made by this Congress and by this Government the South receives but a small proportion. I do not mean to intimate in any way that there is any spirit of unfairness in the legislation of this House, yet I would urge that even to this small appropriation there has been undue opposition, that to my mind is almost unaccountable.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him. Suppose this subsidy to this railroad were discontinued, do you believe that it would make any difference to you and the people of your State in regard to the arrival of the mail? Would not you, anyway, get your mail about as quick——

Mr. MEYER. By no means——

Mr. SULZER (continuing). Whether the railroad got the subsidy or did not get the subsidy?

Mr. MEYER. By no means, Mr. Chairman. As the case now stands, by this train No. 97 we receive our mail at 11.15 in the forenoon. Were this train discontinued and the old order of things reestablished, the same mail would not reach the city of New Orleans until half past 8 at night; consequently business people would not receive their letters until the following day, making a difference of practically a full business day.

Mr. SULZER. Just another word in that connection. If they did not deliver the mail on account of the discontinuance of the subsidy, do you not believe that the Postmaster-General, who contracts for the carrying of this mail by the railroads, could compel the railroad to deliver the mail just as speedily as it does now?

Mr. MEYER. I will say to the gentleman that the Postmaster-General has not done it in all the years that have past; he has perfect and absolute disposition of the money, and the Department has so far failed to secure the fast mail without paying the railroad this extra compensation.

Mr. SULZER. Do you not think it possible, instead of giving the railroad this bonus, the Postmaster-General could make this railroad deliver the mail as quickly and as speedily as other railroads do?

Mr. MEYER. I have no doubt the gentleman has often heard the old adage, "You can lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink." The Postmaster-General has no power to compel the railroads to make that connection.

Mr. SULZER. I just want to say, in closing, to my friend from Louisiana that, in my opinion, this Congress has got sufficient power to make the Postmaster-General make a contract with the Southern Railroad Company to carry this mail just as speedily as it is carried now, without Congress voting the railroad a dollar of subsidy or bonus.

Mr. MEYER. Of course, my friend from New York must know that he has no such power. The power to fix rates arbitrarily has not yet been established. The carrier, as party of the second part, must necessarily be consulted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to submit a few of the numerous letters, petitions, and resolutions sent to me in advocacy of this appropriation.

[From the New Orleans Board of Trade, which numbers in its membership five or six hundred of the leading and most influential business men. February 10, 1906.]

There is considerable apprehension on the part of the business interests of New Orleans that, as the contract for the fast mail service from New York and eastern points to this city is about to expire, there will be no appropriation made for this service.

As the fast mail train No. 97 of the Southern Railway Company runs strictly mail, and has no other revenue, without an appropriation the service is likely to be discontinued.

If the conditions that existed in 1901, when there was much agitation in regard to this subject, made it essential that this service between the North and South should be maintained, it is infinitely more so to-day, when the development of the South has so greatly increased the amount of postal business handled, as is evidenced by the receipts of our New Orleans post-office, which have increased in the past fourteen years from $272,794 in 1891, to $730,419 in 1905, an increase of over $457,000, with a continued increase every year, and an increase of nearly $50,000 last year over 1904.

The board of trade feels that the entire commercial interests of the South would suffer from a discontinuance of the fast mail service reaching through it from the nation's metropolis, and that, on the other hand, all southern commercial interests would be greatly assisted by the establishing of a return fast mail service to that metropolis.

A fast mail service is of benefit not only to the large cities through which it goes, but also to all of the surrounding country. The merchant and planter at the crossroads in the rural districts are not less interested in such a service than are the business men of the cities.

The most immediate connections by mail are necessary in these days of extended commercial correspondence. For many transactions the telegraph will not serve.

We believe that with your assistance, the fair-mindedness and justice of both Houses of Congress will prevent the infliction of so manifest a wrong upon the southern people and their business, and the board of trade trusts, with your help, to prevent any cutting off of our fast mail service appropriation, and, if possible, to secure the additional appropriation requisite for establishing a return fast mail service.

[Letter from New Orleans Board of Trade, March 9, 1906.]

Your communication under date of February 26, addressed to President Kohnke, relative to appropriation for the continuance of the fast mail service between eastern points and New Orleans, was duly received, and he desires me to convey to you his sincere appreciation for the interest you have taken in the matter, which is of such vital importance to the merchants of this city.

As the majority of orders from this city are executed in New York, the advantage of the fast mail for the business men of both cities in the filling of orders, answering of correspondence, and purchase of exchange is practically twenty-four hours.

The regular train on the Southern Railway leaves New York at 4.25 p. m., arriving at New Orleans at 7.15 a. m. of the second morning. If orders are not executed and correspondence prepared for said train, practically a whole day would be lost, whereas with fast mail No. 97 leaving New York at 2.10 a. m. and arriving at New Orleans at 11.25 a. m. the following morning (same morning as the regular train) an entire day is allowed for the executing of orders, answering correspondence, etc.

All foreign mail reaches here on the fast mail, and the matter of exchange and the facilities for filling orders is of great advantage to the business interests of this city.

Should the fast mail be discontinued, it would mean that the business men of New Orleans, who now receive their eastern mail about 11 a. m., would not receive same until the next morning.

No. 97 brings by far the largest amount of mail to New Orleans that is brought by any one train. About 12,000 letters, besides newspapers, etc., are brought in daily, and from 30 to 45 pouches of foreign mail and other packages from various parts of Europe and other foreign countries are received three times a week.

The return fast mail service from here to New York on the same schedule as the fast mail which reaches this city would enable New York business men to get their mail from New Orleans the first thing in the morning instead of in the afternoon.

[Letter from Louisiana Sugar and Rice Exchange, March 2, 1906, transmitting copy of resolutions passed by that body.]

Inclosed I hand you copy of resolutions passed by the board of directors of the Louisiana Sugar Exchange, which speak for themselves.

We are all deeply interested in not only having the appropriation for the present fast mail renewed, but also to have a similar fast mail established northbound. This, as you must realize, will be of enormous advantage to the mercantile and manufacturing interests of New Orleans.

The bulk of domestic exchange here is handled on New York, and the establishment of a fast mail service northbound would save twenty-four hours on all mail matter, and we would appreciate it very much if, through your efforts, this advantage could be extended to our city and State.

[Copy of resolutions.]

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Louisiana Sugar and Rice Exchange held March 1 the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the city of New Orleans and the South in general have enjoyed for some time fast mail service from New York and other eastern commercial centers; and

"Whereas the time has now arrived for renewal of the appropriation for the continuance of the fast mail from New York and eastern points:

"Resolved, That we earnestly request the honorable House of Representatives in Congress assembled to renew the full appropriation for the continuation of this fast mail service, as being absolutely essential to our commercial and industrial prosperity, the advantages of which to our community are too apparent to require recital here."

In addition to this we most respectfully urge that an appropriation be made for the establishment of a similar fast mail service between the large commercial cities of the South and New York and other eastern points. At present the mail leaving here in the evening does not reach New York until the second day about 1 o'clock, and is generally distributed too late to be available for use that day, practically making the mail connections between New York and other large commercial centers a matter of three days.

In these days of commercial activity and the constant use of the telegraph and telephone it is highly important that the mail service be brought up to a similar standard, and we therefore most earnestly urge that a fast mail be established between New Orleans and New York which will enable the delivery of mail matter on the morning of the second day, thus saving twenty-four hours on all mail matter, which in the item of exchange alone would amount to thousands of dollars annually, and thus lessen the tax on the movement of money to and from business centers.

J. C. MURPHY, President.

Attest:
W. MARKS, Acting Secretary.

[Editorial in Daily States of March 1, 1906.]

The importance of the present fast mail train service between New York and New Orleans, which, on account of the expiration of the term for which the appropriation has been made and because of the tendency of Congress to cut down appropriations for fast mail train service, may presently be discontinued, is shown by an examination of facts and figures as they may be obtained at the post-office.

Postmaster T. J. Woodward and Assistant Postmaster George V. Fuchs went over the entire record and the examination was conclusive that this fast mail train from New York, No. 97, brings by far the largest amount of mail to New Orleans that is brought by any one train.

On an average this train brings to New Orleans daily 12,000 letters and 102 tie sacks of newspapers, besides a baggage car full of newspapers which are not tied.

The train which brings in the second largest quantity of mail is No. 3, also from the East over the Louisville and Nashville route, an average of between 8,000 and 10,000 letters.

The train which brings in the third largest quantity of mail is the Illinois Central, No. 5, between 4,000 and 5,000 letters.

Here is set forth in a nutshell the actual mail No. 97 brings into this city:

Daily, 12,000 letters, or about 100 sacks, and 102 sacks of newspapers, tied, and a baggage car filled with newspapers untied.

Three times a week from 30 to 45 pouches of foreign mail, of which 4 sealed packages come twice a week from Italy, 2 from London, 2 from Liverpool, and 2 from Dublin, and other packages from various other parts of Europe and other foreign countries.

Passing through New Orleans for other points daily are on an average from fifty to seventy-five bags of mail for Mexico, large quantities of exchange mail for Central America, and much which has to be resorted for distribution in the local post-office, going to all points in the near vicinity.

The fast mail is of great advantage and facility to the business men and merchants in the filling of orders and in the purchase of exchange. The postal authorities say that if this city had a fast mail to go from here to New York on the same schedule as the one on which the fast mail now reaches this city it would enable the business men of New York to get their mail from New Orleans the first thing in the morning instead of in the afternoon. It has often been a matter of wonder why New Orleans did not have a return fast mail service to the metropolis. The people of New Orleans ought to have the same facilities as those enjoyed by the people of New York. Then the fast return mail to New York would greatly facilitate the filling of orders in New York and the handling of exchange for that city. More orders are executed by New Orleans business men in New York and more New York exchange is bought in the natural course of business here than in all other cities of the country combined. A return fast mail would mean that this exchange could be had and that orders could be filled at least twelve hours earlier than is at present the case.

If the present fast mail service from New York to New Orleans were discontinued, it would mean that business men who now get their eastern mail at 11.30 in the morning would not get the same mail until the next morning, or about eighteen hours later. As all of the Liverpool, Dublin, and London mail reaches here on this fast train and as nine letters out of every ten are to local cotton men pertaining to the cotton business, a great hindrance and hardship would be worked on the cotton business, the mainstay of the South, by the discontinuing of the fast mail service from New York.

[Letter from Cosmopolitan Bank and Trust Company, March 24, 1906.]

With this we take the liberty of adding our request to that of the New Orleans Progressive Union and others of our neighbors regarding the mail facilities especially desired by the New Orleans business community from this city to New York.

As you are aware, there is now a fast train from New York hence to New Orleans, which is found to be of great service and advantage to the business interests of this city and section, but the mail leaving here for New York is not made in the same time, leaving here at 7.15 p. m. and reaching New York on the second day at 1 p. m., too late for the ordinary business transactions of that day called for by our mail, and hence we are put at a disadvantage by the delay in receipt of our letters in New York.

May we not, therefore, ask and urge your kind influence in the endeavor to have established from New Orleans to New York a train that will leave here at 4 p. m., which would make it due in New York on the second day out by 7 o'clock a. m., thus giving practically a saving of an additional day in the attention to the mail from here.

It is needless to say to you that from the situation and importance of New Orleans as the largest center in the South any such facilities would be of incalculable advantage to this section, and would be highly appreciated by the entire community.

That it is the consensus of opinion of the financial interests of New Orleans that there should be established a train from that city to New York, leaving at about 4 p. m., and arriving on the second day at about 7 a. m., is evidenced by letters from the following banks, etc.:

DUTY TO SOUTH.

Mr. Chairman, in passing upon this question of a fast railway mail service for the Southern States it is our duty to look at the situation presented to-day in that section of the Union. It is true that we do not have in the South large cities such as they have in the North and which force the railroads there to expedite their trains in order to secure business.

GROWING SOUTH.

But our cities and towns all exhibit a gratifying increase. This is especially the case in my own city of New Orleans. What is true of the towns and cities—of New Orleans, Galveston, Vicksburg, Memphis, Nashville, Mobile, and Atlanta—is also true of the Southern States in which they lie. There is a large, steady, and gratifying increase of the population.

The State of Louisiana so far exceeded the average rate of increase for the Union that she became entitled to an additional Member of Congress under each of the two rival plans of reapportionment presented to us in 1901. Such comparatively new and fertile States as Kansas and Nebraska did not present an equal increase with Louisiana, although they possess great resources and are located on great lines of railroads. For a long period after the civil war, depressed and discouraged by military rule, by reconstruction, negro and carpetbag ascendency, the South made little or no progress. But as these evils were removed or mitigated the South began to put on a new life. The tree apparently dead began to put forth leaves and branches, and already we behold the fruit.

AGRICULTURE IMPROVED.

Our cotton crop has been largely developed and for some years past prices have been remunerative. Other crops have done well. The cotton seed once deemed useless has been converted into a most valuable product. Every branch of agriculture has improved.

DEVELOPMENT IN MINING.

Our mines of iron and coal have been developed and we now manufacture pig iron cheaper than any country in the world. We are making steel and selling it abroad. Both of these industries are yet in their infancy. There is hardly any limit to their respective growth.

NEW MILLS.

Cotton mills are going up every day. We are manufacturing coarse cottons cheaper than any other people in the world. Our mills are making the highest grades of cotton goods, and it is only a question of time when the South shall monopolize the cotton manufacture of this country and export these goods freely to other lands. [Applause.]

Many other kinds and forms of manufacturing industry are rapidly springing up. There is hardly one of them that can be mentioned in which the South does not possess equal or superior advantages to any other section of this Union.

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY.

Shipbuilding, which has been regarded as exclusively a northern industry, is now being actively prosecuted at Newport News and on the James River, in Virginia. In this rapid forward movement of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce is it not clear to every intelligent mind that rapid, frequent mails are an essential, necessary ingredient? This rapid communication between the South and the North and East is necessary to each—to all the country. [Applause.] To deny it would be a reproach and a scandal.

This, however, is only a part of the story. It is evident that we are on the threshold of a larger, greater commerce with South America, the West Indies, including Cuba, Mexico, and Central America, than ever before. All these countries are rapidly developing. They are attracting immigration, capital, and are about to improve their grand resources.

PANAMA CANAL.

The building of the Panama Canal, now an assured fact, will give a special stimulus to this coming trade. Cuba, freed from the yoke of Spain, exhibits fourfold activities. The South is, or will be, in close touch with all these countries. Your mails and your richest products must pass through her ports and gateways in order to reach these countries. Surely this is no hour for a narrow vision, a contracted policy, or a neglect of the agencies which stimulate commerce and enhance the wealth, power, and glory of our Republic. [Applause.]

REHABILITATION OF SOUTH.

I must not omit to state that this work of southern rehabilitation and progress is mainly, almost exclusively, the work of our own sons. It is not the creation of northern men or the result of foreign immigration. The immigrants from the Northern States or from Europe have followed the lines of climate. They have gone West. More of our sons have gone North and West than the number who have reenforced our ranks of labor and production. We have a right to be proud of this fact. We are paying our full share of the expenses of this Government. Our crops of cotton, tobacco, and other exports go far to swell your favorable balance of trade and bring back foreign gold. We pay heavily for appropriations in which we reap no benefit, and it is a very small return to allow this moderate mail appropriation, so important to our commerce, to remain undisturbed. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13154. An act for the relief of John T. Irion;

H. R. 16140. An act to authorize the maintaining and operating for toll an existing structure across Ingaloo River, known as "Knox's bridge," at a point where said river is the boundary between the States of South Carolina and Georgia;

H. R. 9165. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation to certain lands for cemetery purposes; and

H. R. 2996. An act to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the United States transport Mobile in July and August, 1898.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. PETTUS and Mr. GALLINGER members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. NEWLANDS as conferee on the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States" in place of Mr. PATTERSON, excused from further service.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, it had been my purpose during the consideration of the bill now before the House to make some remarks at some length, particularly upon the subject of railway mail pay, which I think is, on the dense routes, excessive; but circumstances have been such, or my modesty has been so great, that I have not forced myself upon this committee for that purpose; and now, in the few moments that have been assigned me by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], I want simply to touch a few of those things that have been discussed by gentlemen who have preceded me. The conduct of those gentlemen who have discussed particularly one feature of the bill under consideration, namely, the appropriation to facilitate the mails—and I use this word in deference to their delicate senses—to expedite the mail between Washington and New Orleans, leads me to remark that these gentlemen, who are usually so courteous, who are usually so well possessed of their tempers, have, it seems to me, departed from their daily custom. My amiable colleague from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who has made for himself here, as at home, a reputation for courtesy and gentlemanly conduct, so far forgot himself in the heat of discussion in his speech on yesterday as to impress me with being discourteous to one of his colleagues from his own State [Mr. WEBB]. Mr. WEBB made a statement, and my colleague [Mr. SMALL] challenged that statement and challenged him to prove his assertion. When Mr. WEBB interrupted him for the purpose of proving the statement that he had made, my colleague refused to let him do it, and so my purpose upon this floor now, as much as any other thing, is to make peace between the members of my own delegation.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. SMALL. The interruption, as I understand it, was for the purpose of quoting a statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I challenged the gentleman to produce any such statement by that official. I was met by the reply that he had a private letter from the Postmaster-General in response to one that he had written, and I declined, and, I think, properly declined, to permit a letter from the Postmaster-General, Mr. Cortelyou, to be interpolated into my remarks, not intending any discourtesy whatever.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WEBB. My colleague [Mr. SMALL] seems to object that I wanted to put into his speech a statement from the Postmaster-General. I insisted that the letter which I have, and which was written on the 7th of this month, three days ago, was not only signed by the Postmaster-General, but was initialed and countersigned "W. S. S.," which means William S. Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and in that letter he says as to whether the withdrawal of special-facility pay by Congress would cripple the mail service between Washington and Atlanta "that no apprehension is felt that the service would be crippled." That is the statement which I wanted to get into the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. But I would suggest that the letters from the vice-president of the Southern Railway and from the president of the Atlanta and West Point, as read by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] this morning, contain the positive statement that this specal train 97, under the present schedule for expediting the mails, will not be continued if this appropriation is withheld, and I take it that they know more about the matter than does the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to my colleagues for the explanations which they have both made.

Now, there was one other statement made by my colleague [Mr. SMALL] that I want to give him the opportunity to correct on this floor. In his speech on yesterday he charged that those gentlemen who had opposed this appropriation to facilitate the mail between Washington and New Orleans had uniformly voted for the appropriation to expedite the mails between the Pacific coast and the island of Tahiti.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PAGE. No, sir; not now. I refute the charge, and if my language is parliamentary, and if no one will ask to have it taken down, I will say that that statement is untrue as touching quite a number of gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Including myself.

Mr. WEBB. And including me.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. I believe it will be admitted that up to the time that I brought the attention of the House yesterday to the subsidy for the mail from San Francisco to Tahiti, that particular subsidy had not been mentioned in this debate. I believe the gentleman will admit that.

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. You brought it in yesterday, but it has been debated on the floor of the House in previous sessions of Congress, and we have knocked it out, and the Senate has afterwards put it in.

Mr. SMALL. There had been no opposition to it in this debate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. I do not yield to anyone. As touching the appropriation itself, I have very little to say. My record in the brief time I have been in Congress speaks for itself. I have uniformly voted against this appropriation for the reason that I have not believed, nor do I believe, that it is necessary to facilitate the mails into that section from which I come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I refute the charge that the section which is represented on this floor by seven gentlemen, four from the State of North Carolina and three from the State of South Carolina, in which more than one-third of the cotton that is manufactured in America is manufactured, that a section that is prosperous, not only in this line, but along every other line, there is any necessity for it to come to the National Government as a suppliant for its bounty. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the great business of that section will bring to it all the facilities for mail and other things that it needs or that it cares to have. There are other railroads running into that great section that I in part represent upon this floor, and their trains go with all the speed that up-to-date locomotives built by skilled Americans can carry them without being paid any bounty by anyone. I believe too much in that section from which I come, in its present prosperity, in its glorious future, and I believe that there is not one iota of necessity for this appropriation from the National Government; and as long as I so believe my vote shall be recorded against it.

Mr. Chairman, passing from this, I want to say one other thing. There is in the bill under consideration a provision made for the weighing of all the second-class matter by the postmasters during the last six months of this year. Anything on earth that will bring to the attention of this House or the committee information that will bring them to solve the great problem of facilitating mails meets with my approval. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in connection with this provision and remarks made by gentlemen on this floor during this discussion that I see something other than information. As long as magazines and other periodicals of this country were engaged in the exposition of the graft and greed of insurance presidents and others who are high in the financial world, in taking the money that did not belong to them, everybody bid them all-hail and all-speed. But the very moment it was discovered that the Republican party became the beneficiaries of the pilferings of these men, then the edict has gone forth and the writers of these articles have become the "men with the muck rake." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And in the future you will find that the magazines will not any more have the privilege of the penny postage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, as the House of Representatives is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I desire to take advantage of the time at my disposal to say a few words in regard to a matter I deem of much public moment and of vital importance to all the people in our land. I refer to the preservation of one of the greatest scenic wonders in all the world—Niagara Falls.

There are pending in Congress at the present time several bills, any one of which, I believe, if enacted into law, will go far to effectually put a stop for a long time to come to the further devastation of these wonderful waterfalls by the sordid hand of industrialism and the greedy selfishness of commercialism; but thus far, I regret to say, no action has been taken regarding the matter, and I very much fear that unless something is done, and very speedily done, this session of Congress will adjourn without anything being accomplished to protect Niagara Falls from further spoliation.

I appeal to-day to those Members in this House who have in charge this important matter to be up and doing, so that ere we adjourn there will be a law upon the Federal statute books that will make it impossible for any more water for commercial purposes to be diverted from Niagara River—a law that will protect and preserve the beauty and the grandeur of this wonder of wonders, in so far as Congress can do so, for generations yet to come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the "thunder of waters" of the aborigines, the most awe-inspiring spectacle ever seen by a human being, the promised land of all lovers of natural scenery, the scenic Mecca toward which millions of people travel every year from all parts of the world—the tumultuous, tremendous, thundering Niagara Falls—must not be destroyed, but must be preserved in all its marvelous splendor by this generation for all the ages yet to come. This is our duty. We are charged with this responsibility. We can not and we must not evade it. These Niagara Falls do not belong to any country or to any people. They are the inalienable heritage of humanity, and one generation must preserve them in all their power and in all their beauty for the benefit of the next generation. This is the unwritten law of the eternal rights of mankind, and we must not prove false to our trust or recreant to our responsibility.

The devastation of Niagara Falls is a crime against generations yet unborn, and if we permit the piratical interests of utilitarian industrialism, so rampant in this practicable age, to go on with the spoliation of this magnificent gift of the Creator of the universe, we will be false to the great trust humanity has reposed in us and the future will justly hold us up to obloquy and contempt and execration.

We are the trustees of the free institutions of the fathers and of the natural grandeur and scenic glory of our beautiful land, charged by the sacred rights of mankind to transmit them unimpaired to future generations; and if we fail to preserve and protect the institutions of the fathers, and every beautiful picture in nature's art gallery for those who are to come after us we will be false to our duty, recreant to the solemn trust reposed in us, and justly censurable by those who will follow after us.

Mr. Chairman, the mighty surplus waters of the Great Lakes, as they dash in torrential waves through the narrow confines of Niagara River for 32 miles and then tumultuously plunge in myriad-colored volumes over the precipitous falls of Niagara, is one of the greatest, one of the grandest, and one of the most glorious wonders of the earth—the most awe-inspiring spectacle of its kind little man has ever beheld. You must see it to appreciate it. No tongue can do it justice. No pen can describe it. No painter can picture it. But it is not so much the height of the falls that beggars description—it is the immensity of the volume of water that jumps and leaps and tumbles and rages and roars and thunders over the falls that makes them as unique as they are glorious and indescribable.

The waters of the Great Lakes are discharged through the Niagara River into Ontario, and then on and on oceanward through the St. Lawrence. The mean level of Lake Erie is about 572 feet and that of Lake Ontario about 246 feet above the sea. Leaving Lake Erie at Buffalo the Niagara River is navigable and flows with a moderate slope to a short distance below the Welland River, about 19 miles, in which distance it has a fall of something like 14 feet. The slope here is suddenly increased and the river ceases to be navigable. In the next half mile it has a fall of about 50 feet, forming the rapids above the falls. It is divided by Goat Island into two arms of equal size, that on the Canadian side carrying, it is said, about seven times the volume of water carried on the American side. At the foot of Goat Island the waters of both arms leap over a vertical precipice, constituting Niagara Falls proper, that on the Canadian side being known as the Horseshoe Fall, and that on the American side being called the American Fall. The height of the Horseshoe Fall is about 161 feet, and that of the American Fall about 165 feet. Immediately below the falls the river is again navigable for a short distance, and then assumes the character of magnificent rapids as far as Lewiston, 7 miles from Ontario, where it again becomes navigable and remains so until it enters Lake Ontario.

The volume of water flowing over the falls varies somewhat with the level of Lake Erie, which is subject at times to variations of several feet, depending upon rainfall, barometric pressure, and the direction and force of the wind. At the mean level of Lake Erie the volume of discharge is about 200,000 cubic feet per second. When you come to calculate it, the power of this tremendous volume of water is almost incomprehensible. This gigantic body of water going over these majestic falls every second, and the intensely interesting rapids above and below them, make Niagara Falls a place of indescribable scenery and in uniqueness and grandeur among the seven wonders of the earth.

Years ago the State of New York passed a law creating a beautiful park, consisting of about 400 acres, on the American side; and every year the State appropriates $25,000 for its care and maintenance. The Canadian government has also created by law a splendid park on the Canadian side, consisting of about 700 acres. And these parks carefully maintained lend additional beauty and enjoyment to the inspiring wonders of nature.

It is said, and investigation demonstrates it, that the falls are receding from natural causes, regardless of commercial desecration, and in the many centuries to come will be only a shadow of their present greatness and glory. In looking over the surveys made by eminent engineers in 1842, 1875, 1886, and 1890, I find that the American Fall has receded at the rate of 0.64 of a foot a year, or 30.75 feet between 1842 and 1890, and the Horseshoe Fall during the same period, 2.18 feet annually, or 104.51 feet in forty-eight years, a very much higher rate of recession than was ever thought of prior to the second survey in 1875. Of course the falls do not recede evenly; some parts of the crest remain more or less stationary, while others change rapidly. The figures I have cited represent the points of greatest activity. According to this data, the total area of rock surface which has disappeared at the American Fall between 1842 and 1890 represents about 33,000 square feet, practically three-fourths of an acre. At the Horseshoe Fall there has disappeared during the same period about 275,000 square feet, or over 6 acres. In all descriptions of the American Fall we speak of one, although there are two, but the second one, called the "Luna Fall," is so small that it is seldom referred to, and is interesting chiefly because it affords the sightseer an opportunity to go behind the falling waters into the so-called "Cave of the Winds."

Geologists have given much study to Niagara Falls, and have speculated as to the future length of life of this incomprehensible marvel of nature, and how many thousands of years it will take before the increasing thickness of the Niagara limestone, and the decreasing exposure of the soft underlying shales will reduce the height of the falls to a mere series of succeeding rapids; but I predict that if the present sordid selfishness of industrial vandalism goes on, it will destroy the unrivaled beauty and diminish the incomparable grandeur of this gigantic water inspiration of the world long before any change is produced by natural erosion.

We can not stop the forces of nature in their unceasing work of destruction, but we can and we must fetter the sordid, selfish, spoliation of man.

The great water power available at Niagara Falls attracted the attention of scheming commercialists at an early day, but it was not until this immense power could be transmitted and used in the form of electricity that its development on a large scale became financially profitable. Within recent years the Canadian government, or the Province of Ontario, and the State of New York have granted franchises, the value of which can not at this time be computed in figures, to corporations, allowing them to divert the waters from the falls and use its tremendous force for power purposes. There are, I am informed, a half dozen corporations on both sides of the river chartered by the Province of Ontario, or the Canadian government, and the State of New York, and these soulless corporations are doing more to-day to forever destroy these magnificent falls than the forces of nature have done in all the ages of the past.

This Government and Great Britain, acting separately or jointly, must stop this criminal exploitation of the falls for commercial purposes. It is a crime against future generations, and the two Governments concerned ought to take the matter in hand at once and put a stop to it for all time to come. Congress should have done its duty in the premises long ago. These magnificent falls do not belong to the State of New York or to the Canadian government—they belong to the people of all the world; and it is incumbent on this Government and on the British Government to preserve and protect this magnificent wonder of nature and hand it down to future generations with all its beauty unimpaired and all its grandeur undiminished.

We must pass stringent laws to prevent the further granting of franchises to greedy commercial interests by the State of New York, and appeal to the Canadian government to take like action. The franchise heretofore granted by the legislature of the State of New York were granted with few restrictions, and without a single dollar of compensation to the people; and the money-making value of these franchises, if they can not be forfeited, is beyond the calculation of the human mind. The Canadian government, however, more wise and farseeing, did not grant a single franchise without important reservations and full compensation; and I am informed that the tax or revenue the Province of Ontario, or the Canadian government, derives from the franchises heretofore granted to corporations to divert the waters from the falls of Niagara amounts to about $300,000 annually.

Bills are now pending in the legislature of the State of New York, and in the legislative assembly of the Province of Ontario, granting additional franchises to corporations to divert the waters of Niagara, and unless a stop is put to this ruthless and sordid and selfish practice by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain by virtue of a treaty, it will not be so very many years before the beauties of Niagara, the wonders of the falls, and all the grandeur of this inspiring and indescribable painting—the grandest ever placed by the hand of the Infinite in nature's unrivaled scenic gallery—will be no more.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what can the Congress do? What is our duty? How can we put a stop to the further devastation of this magnificent wonder which belongs to all the people of all the world and for all the ages? I answer these questions by saying that the Congress of the United States can put a stop to the further destruction of Niagara Falls so far as the American side is concerned by passing a law making it a crime for any person or corporation to divert any of the waters from the Niagara River for commercial purposes. The Niagara River is a navigable stream, and it being navigable, under the powers of the Constitution, the laws of Congress in regard to it are supreme. This being so, I contend that the Congress should, without further delay, pass a law along the lines I have indicated, and if this is done it will effectually put a stop to the State of New York granting any more franchises; and I hope that those already granted will be carefully investigated, and wherever possible, abrogated.

But this Government can do more than protect the American side of the falls. It can act through its treaty-making powers. The Niagara River being the boundary between the United States and Canada, the United States and Great Britain have the undoubted right by treaty stipulation to impose such conditions and limitations upon the use of the river and its waters as they deem proper. A treaty duly negotiated between these two powers and ratified by the Senate of the United States would be the supreme law of the land; and if in such treaty it were provided that the waters of Niagara River should not be diverted for commercial purposes and this regulation be enforced by act of Congress the treaty and the legislation would be valid and constitutional—all the rights of the State of New York and of private riparian owners to the contrary notwithstanding. Such a treaty should be quickly negotiated, and I hope it will be. I believe that the President is alive to the real situation, and I trust he will negotiate a treaty with Great Britain at the earliest practicable time to prevent the future spoliation of Niagara Falls. But pending the negotiation of this treaty we, the Members of Congress, have the right and the power to enact legislation as I have suggested that will effectually prevent the further exploitation and devastation of Niagara Falls through the granting of franchises by the legislature of the State of New York. Mr. Chairman, this Government must act in this matter, and act at once, before the cunning and piratical hands of utilitarian industrialism destroy this mgnificent picture, the gretest scenic wonder ever painted by the unerring hand of the Infinite in the art gallery of nature. This generation must preserve in all its grandeur the magnificent water falls at Niagara from the spoliation of sordid commercialism and transmit them unimpaired to future generations. If the executive and the legislative branches of this Government will do their duty, and do it quickly, the Falls of Niagara will be saved. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT].

Mr. MCDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, with the approach of Easter come the stories of threatened massacre in Russia. Men and boys, women and girls, babes in mothers' arms are to be slaughtered by savage bigots, in whose brains the Russian Greek Church seems to have left no trace of mercy.

In the name of Christ and the cross, men called "Christians" have tortured and slaughtered men, women, and children during eighteen hundred years. In the name of the cross bigots have persecuted each other, the Jew, and the heathen. During seventeen hundred years of the Christian era nearly every fanatic who evolved from his mean and miserable brain a "command from heaven" cheerfully and diligently persecuted those of his fellow-men who disagreed with his insanity. Around the stake, in the torture chamber, and on the field of battle "Christian soldiers" have been transformed into wild beasts, sparing none.

While engaged in the congenial occupation of murdering each other, frenzied zealots of nearly all the Christian creeds have made common cause against the Jews. The world has been drenched with their blood, as though God had given command for the extermination of those whom the Old Testament denominates "his chosen children." In Chapter XIII of Deuteronomy the following directions are given for taking care of a town where "false gods" are worshiped:

> Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword. And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shall burn with fire the city and all the spoil thereof.

These directions were, according to the Old Testament, revealed by God and written by Moses. If the legend could be changed to have the order written by Satan and issued from hell, a very great work of justice would be done to the reputations of both God and Moses. It is difficult to form a correct estimate of Moses, but it is certain that he is one of the great figures in the history of mankind. He was a great soldier, a great statesman, a great man, and it is well to redeem his name from slander. The directions were written long after his death, and the wretch who wrote them probably thought that he was inspired—probably thought that his heart of rock and brain of hate were under divine guidance, whereas he was merely ferocious and insane. The "commands" can not now be read without a shudder, and yet it would seem as if they had been taken as a pattern for the use of the "Christian sword" in dealing with the Jews.

In the Old World persecution of the Jews stains almost every chapter of history. Before the Christian era those people were persecuted, murdered, enslaved; but this was in the regular course of events, the business of nations then being to persecute, murder, and enslave, a sort of orderly procedure in days when every nation was against every other nation, when war was constant, when man had not learned the dignity of labor. But it was not until Christianity had obtained dominion that the Jews were persecuted because they refused to "accept Christ." From then the spirit of oppression has grown. Persecution of the Jews, because they are Jews, is to-day tolerated in but few parts of the Christian world, so far as the statute books go; but the spirit that is breathed in the words "Christ killer" is found in the eyes and on the tongues of Christians in the New World as well as in the old. It is not difficult to find the cause of this. Many people are, after a fashion, taught the Bible. Some read it. Nearly all who are taught it and many of those who read it get the idea that nearly nineteen hundred years ago the Jews crucified Christ; that his cruel death is to be ever a subject of sorrow, and that the Jews are, unless they give evidence by conversion that they join in that sorrow, to be hated and hounded even unto death.

Persecution of Jews has always ceased with apostacy. It is so in Russia to-day. There the Jew who will say that he believes in the Russian Greek Church becomes a man before the law, and his life and property are safe. He is no longer a "Christ killer." Against those Jews who refuse to forsake the beliefs of their fathers the bigots of the Russian church proceed with sword and torch, and never so ferociously as on the anniversary of the day when Christ is supposed to have risen from the dead. At Easter the Russians greet each other, the first speaker saying, "Christos voscress" (Christ is risen), and the response is always "Vo istiney voscress" (He is risen, indeed). Anyone who has visited Russia or studied the history of its people knows what vague ideas are embraced in these Easter greetings. There—and perhaps here—there is a belief that the resurrected Christ triumphed over his enemies—the Jews. The greetings over, horror follows. We can not effectively remonstrate to the Russian Government, asking it to prevent the murders and outrages that follow the dawn of Easter; but we can ask the church of that Government to interfere. We can, observing every propriety, ask that the power of that church be used to prevent recurrence of brutalities that shock the civilized world. We can do more than this. We can set an example. We can teach the men, women, and children of our own land to array themselves on the side of truth. We can teach in press and pulpit, that the statement that Jesus Christ was crucified by the Jewish nation is the wickedest falsehood that ever fell from human lips.

If Christ was a mortal, if he was the son of Joseph and Mary, born in the good old-fashioned way, he was crucified by the Romans. If he was the Son of God, he was crucified by the direction of his Father. Under neither proposition can the Jews be held accountable. If he was a mortal, he was the prisoner of Rome, and the Jews, as a race, never cried for his blood.

Let us look at the evidence. The sayings that are credited to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John agree that Christ was popular with the Jews at Jerusalem. He had advocated what seemed to him necessary reforms. Those in charge of the Temple objected. He called them harsh names, and the common people seem to have agreed.

Matthew says that when the chief priests and Pharisees would have laid hands on Jesus, after he had driven the traders out of the Temple, they dared not do so, because "they feared the multitude."

Matthew and Mark agree that when the priests and scribes consulted, at the house of Caiaphas, about the killing of Jesus they agreed that it should not be done on a feast day "lest there be an uproar among the people."

Luke says that all the people were attentive to Christ, and that when he taught in the Temple all the people came early in the morning to hear Him, and adds: "And the chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him, for they feared the people."

When these accounts were written no man knows or has information upon which to found a reasonable guess, but in the discussion of this subject there is not any other testimony to be considered, because there is not any other testimony obtainable. This seems certain: The Jews did not have power to put Christ to death, and Pontius Pilate did not care anything about the religious controversies of the Jews. It is certain that Christ was accused of treason, and it is certain that he was executed by Roman soldiers. That Pontius Pilate did not desire to pronounce judgment; that his wife was opposed to it; that he "washed his hands" of the matter, and then told the centurions to proceed with the crucifixion; all these propositions seem to me absurd. Pontius Pilate cared nothing for the shouts of a rabble. It may be that he was somewhat in disfavor at Rome, that he feared it might be reported there that he had shielded one who was charged with treason, but this can not be made to agree with the story that he first acquitted and then executed his prisoner. To have reported such a proceeding to his Emperor would have been to invite disgrace and dismissal.

But let us take the story as it is generally taught. Let us suppose that a rabble, incited by the priests, made enough noise to induce Pontius Pilate to pronounce judgment of death. How, in the name of common sense, does this place the crucifixion upon the Jewish race? When a mob lynches a prisoner in New Jersey or Delaware or South Carolina we do not say that the victim was lynched by the American people. The mob that yelled at Pontius Pilate was wholly without authority to say that its doings should become a charge against the Jewish race. A mob can not charge its wrongdoings to the debit account of a nation, and yet so liberal a writer as Ernest Renan, after quoting from Mark, says:

> It was, then, neither Tiberius nor Pilate who condemned Jesus. It was the old Jewish party. It was the Mosaic law.
> According to our modern ideas, there is no inheritance of guilt from father to son. Each must account to human or divine justice only for that which he himself has done. Every Jew who to-day suffers for the murder of Jesus has, therefore, a right to complain, for he might have been a Simon the Cyrenean, or at least not have been one of those who cried "Crucify him!" But nations, like individuals, have their responsibility. If ever a crime was the crime of a nation, it was surely the crucifixion of Jesus. His death was "legal in the sense that it was primarily caused by a law which was the very soul of the nation."

Admitting for the moment that Christ was crucified under the Jewish law, it may be well for Christians to remember that the law is not found in a secular volume. It is, in all its beauty, found in the thirteenth chapter of Deuteronomy, and the children in our Sunday schools are taught that it was written by Moses, under divine guidance, shortly before his death. It reads:

> 6. If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers;
> 7. Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth;
> 8. Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him; neither shalt thou spare; neither shalt thou conceal him;
> 9. But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people.
> 10. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

According to the Christian religion these directions were perfectly good until the Christian era. The New Testament does not tell us that God repented for having taught men that they should murder their children if the latter made the slip of getting on bowing terms with the gods in the next county. The Christian religion amended the old law; it taught new rules, but it never declared that the rules laid down in Deuteronomy were unconstitutional, and to-day the Christian churches teach that the old law was all right in its day. If this is so, then, for over a thousand years the Jews were taught, under divine inspiration, that they had no higher duty than to kill whoever attempted to teach them a new religion.

I do not believe that a sane god ever dictated any such directions, or that Moses ever wrote them. But Renan is wrong in saying that Christ was crucified under this law. He was put to death, not for assailing the Mosaic law, but because he was accused of treason to Tiberius. According to Matthew, the Roman soldiers set over the head of Christ his accusation:

> This is Jesus, the King of the Jews.

Mark says:

> And the superscription of his accusation was written, "The King of the Jews."

Luke says:

> And a superscription also was written over him in letters of Greek and Latin and Hebrew, "This is the King of the Jews."

John is said to have heard of it in this fashion:

> And Pilate wrote a title and put it on the cross. And the writing was, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." Then said the chief priests of the Jews to Pilate, "Write not the King of the Jews, but that he said I am the King of the Jews." Pilate answered, "What I have written I have written."

Christ was not stoned to death under the Mosaic law. He was crucified under the Roman law. According to John, Pilate said to the accusers:

Take ye Him and judge Him according to your law.

The Jews answered:

It is not lawful for us to put any man to death.

Matthew says that the mob cried, "His blood be on us and on our children." Neither, Mark, Luke, nor John ever heard of this invocation, and it was probably interpolated in the "Gospel according to St. Matthew" after the Christian religion had been preached to the Romans. Tacitus had written that, in the reign of Tiberius, Christ was "brought to punishment by Pontius Pilate, the procurator." Some one may have thought it would be easier to establish the Christian religion at Rome if the Roman governor and his army could be relieved from the stain of the crucifixion.

If Christ was a mortal, His crucifixion was one of the regrettable incidents of this world. If He was a mortal, He was a martyr, and this whether He suffered death because He desired to reform the management of the Temple or was intent upon removing the Roman yoke from the neck of His people.

But it is not because a human being was crucified that the Jews are persecuted. It is because they are charged with having crucified the Son of God. The words and spirit of the New Testament—the whole theory of the Christian religion—prove that this miserable charge should be abandoned. God created and peopled the world; man was weak and fell, and continued in his wicked ways until God drowned all living things, except a few and the fishes. It would probably have been better if Noah and his family had been drowned also and a fresh start taken. The saved generated wickedness, and the accountability of the human race for original sin continuing, God ordained a scheme of salvation which included the crucifixion of His son. Accepting this as true, how can the Jews be held accountable for the death of that Son. If an omnipotent God orders anything done, the human instruments selected to carry out His orders can not be charged with the acts commanded. The doctrine of repondeat superior applies.

If what happened could have been prevented by the Romans or by the Jews, then the New Testament is worthless. Let us assume that the Jews crucified Christ. Could they have done otherwise? Were they greater than God? According to the Bible, the crucifixion was arranged for by the Father. Why blame the Jews or the Romans or any other mortals? They did not know what they were doing. The Roman soldiers did not believe that they were crucifying the Son of God; they did not know that they were crucifying God himself. Why blame the instruments? Why persecute the descendants?

According to the synoptic gospels and according to John, the arrangements for the crucifixion—every detail—were made by Almighty God, and were known to Christ.

According to Matthew, Christ predicted His death, entombment, and resurrection, saying: "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three nights in the heart of the earth."

Christ told His disciples that He must go unto Jerusalem and suffer many things and be crucified. He told Peter, James, and John not to publish the details of His transfiguration "until the Son of man be risen from the dead." He said: "The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men and they shall kill Him." He said that He "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life, a ransom for many." He fell on His face and prayed, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt."

When one of His disciples would have resisted the capture, Jesus said that He could, by praying to His Father, obtain for His defense "more than twelve legions of angels," and added: "But how, then, shall the Scriptures be fulfilled that it must be?"

Moses and Elias talked to Jesus about His "decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem." He said to His disciples:

Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished.

According to Luke, Christ predicted that He should be delivered to the Gentiles, mocked, spitted on, scourged, and crucified. When Pontius Pilate told Jesus that he had power to crucify or release Him, Jesus answered that the Roman had no power except it was given from above. Everything that was done was done in order "that the Scriptures might be fulfilled." Take this proposition from the New Testament, and the scheme of salvation is gone. Whoever wrote the "Gospel according to St. John," realized this, and these words are there credited to Christ:

As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down myself. I have power to law it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received from the Father.

The Jews refuse to believe that their ancestors crucified the Son of God. They are told that those who believe shall be saved, while those who doubt shall be damned. They answer that the proposition does not conform to the Mosaic law, and on this point they are beyond contradiction. They did not believe, and do not believe, that Herod slew all the male children "that were in Bethlehem and all the borders thereof from 2 years old and under." They have not as yet been able to make this story in Matthew agree with that of Luke, who says that Jesus was taken to Jerusalem a few days after His birth. They say that they can not understand why, if Joseph was not the father of Jesus, His mother should say to Him when He was at the age of 13, found in the Temple, "Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with me? Behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee, sorrowing."

To the Jews of nineteen hundred years ago and to the Jews of to-day the New Testament did not and does not appeal with sufficient force to produce belief. The miracles did not convince them. The Christian creed was very indefinite for centuries. St. Paul said:

If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God has raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

The Jews could not find the redeeming quality in this belief. They answered:

If Christ was God, or the Son of God, and was crucified and was raised from the dead, of what consequence is it whether we believe it or not?

When the Christians, in the early days, quarreled about their creed, the Jews were not aided. In the fourth century the creed was settled. Constantine, having embraced Christianity, called or suggested a council of bishops. It is not to be charged against the council that Constantine was one of the vilest murderers that ever disgraced the name of man. The council promulgated a creed. The Jews said, and yet say, that this creed is beyond human comprehension. The trouble with them is that they lacked and yet lack faith, and it is sure that no one without faith can clearly understand that creed. To anyone with faith it is as clear as the Book of Revelations. Not having faith, the Jews have not understood, and not understanding they have not accepted. It might have been better if something had been presented which would have allowed comprehension to precede belief; but it was and is, nevertheless, according to those who did and do understand, most reprehensible for the Jews to remain obstinate. Let this be admitted. Is not their punishment prescribed? Are they not to suffer in hell everlasting? Are they not to be boiled and baked and burned through countless trillions of years? This will, as I understand it, be sufficient to satisfy an offended God.

Why, then, should the prospect not be sufficient to satisfy those who believe in peace on earth, good will to men, and the possibility of hell hereafter? Let the church of Russia speak! Let the Czar speak! He is the head of that church. Not one in a thousand Russians knows that Christ was a Jew. The Russian Greek Church has in its possession many bushels of relics. It has sticks and stones and bones and rags. It proclaims that it has a garment worn by Christ; that it has some of his blood; that it has a picture of the Blessed Virgin, drawn by St. Luke; that it has the hand of St. Mark and the bones of the Prophet Daniel. That there is any efficacy in these relics is not believed by anyone outside of the Russian Church, but within that church they can be made instruments of command. Let the churches of Russia resound with the cry that the hand of St. Mark is the hand of a Jew. Tell the people that the garment of Christ was worn by a Jew. Tell those who crowd the churches that on the day of final judgment Jesus Christ will hold court with twelve Jews as associate judges. Tell the congregations that those who murder Jews will be punished in the next world—will be condemned to eternal punishment. Use the relics. The day will come when they will be cast aside, but that day is many generations afar. While they are paraded, let it be in the cause of humanity. The Russian Greek Church has done little or no good on this earth. It has not taught peace and good will; it has walked with the wicked and the cruel. It has not done its duty to the age in which it is tolerated.

In the greater part of the civilized world philosophy, science, and commerce have secured men from the fangs of ferocious bigots. We know that there never was and never can be a martyr without a murderer. We know that there is not a single word in the accredited sayings of Christ that will justify the murder of a human being. We no longer burn witches; we no longer wage wars of extermination. We no longer use the torture chamber, the stake, or the faggot. We no longer believe that God employs the merciless to execute his commands. We no longer believe that the blood of infants is demanded by a heavenly fiend. We have not yet fully learned the lesson of true toleration; but we are advancing. It would be impossible to-day for any king who had murdered his wife to successfully start a new Christian church, or for a man who had burned his friend at the stake to be heard on religious questions. The plea of religious belief is no longer accepted as an excuse for crime. This is so in every country that has a true claim to civilization. It is not true in Russia because Russia is not a civilized country. It is better than it was fifty years ago; far better than it was a century ago. It is emerging from the darkness; it is moving toward the light; its steps, halting and painfully slow, are, nevertheless, toward civilization—toward true manhood, true womanhood, and true childhood. It is almost impossible to estimate how much this advance will be aided if the Russian Church will display on every cathedral, on every meetinghouse, on every altar, the legend:

Remember that Christ was born of a Jewess. He was not crucified by the Jews, but died because His death was commanded by His Father, the God whom you worship.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, Postmaster-General Bissel annulled a number of very costly "mail subsidies," economized in that way, saving nearly $17,000,000 in the year 1893 or 1894, as he states. He alludes to this in his report, dated November 20, 1894, and I desire to print in the RECORD what he says on the subject, as follows:

ECONOMIES.

While the policy of this Department has been, as foreshadowed in my last annual report, to develop the postal service under existing methods of administration, avoiding expensive experiments, still, great care has been taken to effect economies in all matters not likely, in the opinion of the Department, to affect the efficiency of the service.

HOW MONEY HAS BEEN SAVED.

The economies have consisted mainly in securing relief to the Government from existing contract obligations and from reletting contracts for mail transportation, and upon the cost and amount of supplies. Of the first, the more important relate to the steamship subsidy contracts which had been made by my predecessor pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891. I found eleven such contracts in existence, most of them running for ten years and none less than five years. Seven of the eleven contracts have been entirely abrogated during the year.

CONTRACTS ANNULLED.

The payments stipulated to be made by the Government under these seven contracts were very large in amount, while the advantages to accrue to it were so purely theoretical as to render their abandonment the subject of congratulation. A detailed statement of these contracts will follow in this report. I here state only the aggregate amount saved by annulment. I add to the list only such other economies effected in the line of what seemed to be good administration as are capable of definite ascertainment and actual computation.

The total amount of useless expenditure thus avoided is as follows:

Steamship subsidy contracts	$14,431,325.09
Stamped envelopes	906,480.00
Adhesive postage stamps	275,156.00
Repairs of scales	2,000.00
Repairs of carrier satchels	11,435.33
Saving on supplies of twine	12,000.00
From reletting contracts for star service	902,644.84
From reletting contracts for steamboat service	78,006.16
Total	16,619,047.42

CONTRACT OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Only three contracts are in operation, viz, New York to La Guayra, New York to Tuxpan, and New York to Habana:

At a cost of	$286,868.00
If they had not been under contract the cost would have been	29,088.72
The difference being	257,779.28

The noncontract system gives us the choice of the fastest and best steamers at a minimum of cost, but has the disadvantage of leaving us without any control over the movements of the vessels.

STEAMSHIP SUBSIDY CONTRACTS.

The following table shows the contracts made by my predecessor under the act of March 3, 1891, the obligations created under each, those canceled during the year, and those now remaining in force:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the postal system of the United States may properly be said to have begun under the illustrious Benjamin Franklin, who was Postmaster-General of the colonies from 1753 to 1774. His administration of affairs during that nineteen-year period was especially noted for its efficiency, and commended not only at home, but abroad, for what he had accomplished, and yet at the end of his long service the postal receipts were only $15,000 per annum. It is remarkable what has been the growth of this wonderful American system. In 1790, when the Government began its existence, there were seventy-five post-offices, and the receipts of that year were $38,000. In 1850, sixty years afterwards, the number of post-offices was twenty-five times as great, and the receipts and expenditures were one hundred and fifty times as much as at the beginning. In 1905 the post-offices were four times as many as they were in the year 1860, and the receipts and expenditures were thirty times as great as they were at that time. The greatest number of post-offices in the history of the Republic was in 1901, when there were 76,945. This number has been reduced each year since that time because of the rural free delivery, and the probabilities are that that number will be greatly diminished in the next few years.

It is not my purpose to follow the history of postal legislation and the development of this great system. I am concerned to talk somewhat with reference to some of the questions that affect the country and some of those in the items of this bill.

The pending measure carries a greater amount in money by $10,000,000 than was ever carried by a post-office appropriation bill. There is not one dollar appropriated that was not thought to be necessary to be appropriated by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It is true that there are some items in this bill upon which there is some difference of opinion. You have seen an exhibition of that difference in the last few minutes. It is not my purpose, however, in the time allotted me, to discuss the special facilities, which is the subject of greatest disagreement.

The postmasters in the United States to-day receive over $22,000,000 for their services. It may be a fact, to which your attention has not been called, that the postmasters of the United States are receiving one-half as much as is paid to the railroad companies for carrying the mail of the country. It may be a fact with which you are not familiar that we pay as much to the city carriers and to the clerks and assistants in city post-offices as is paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of mail.

The postmasters' salaries in the last five years have increased 19 per cent. The pay to the railroad companies for carrying the mail has increased 19 per cent. The letter carriers' salaries in this period have increased 48 per cent, and the compensation for clerks in post-offices has increased in the period of five years 70 per cent. It is my purpose in the remarks that I shall make to confine myself mainly to the question of railway mail pay.

To me, and I suppose to you, it is a difficult and an intricate question to determine whether or not the pay to the railroad companies for carrying the mail is excessive or not. I shall at this moment call attention to the comparative expenditures for railway mail pay and also the expenditures of the Post-Office Department in general. We expended, in 1880, for carrying the mail, $9,200,000; in 1905 we paid $46,700,000, about five times as much. The general expenses of the Post-Office Department in 1880 were $36,000,000; in 1905, twenty-five years later, $181,000,000, or practically five times as much, showing that the progress in amount paid to railroads and the amount paid in the expenditures for the Post-Office Department have kept pace with each other. One of the most difficult things to determine in the investigation of this matter is how the mail is weighed and compensation based thereon is determined.

I submit at this time and will put in the RECORD a statement of the schedule of rates for the railway mail transportation. The law is so framed that the greater amount of mail there is carried, the less per pound it will cost to carry the mail. If there has been an average weight of 200 pounds carried on a railway train, it will cost $42.75 to carry it. An average weight of 500 pounds will cost $64.12. Five thousand pounds will only cost $171, and every additional 2,000 pounds costs $21.37 to carry it. This is an automatic reduction.

Most persons discussing the question of railway mail pay, especially those who are of the opinion that the amount expended for this item is too great, insist that we pay too much per pound for carrying the mail. They insist also that the law affecting railway mail pay has not been changed since 1878, and that because the railroad companies have voluntarily reduced freight rates and passenger charges the law ought to be changed reducing railway mail pay.

Since 1880 the reduction on account of passenger traffic has been from 2½ cents per mile to 2 cents per mile, a reduction of one-half cent per mile, or a decrease of 20 per cent. There has been a diminution also on account of freight charges of 40 per cent; but, strange to say, if you have not investigated it, there has been a reduction of 47 per cent on account of railway mail pay. In other words, the railroad companies in 1905 received 47 per cent less per ton-mile for carrying the mail than they did in 1880, and under this automatic reduction, by reason of the fact that there was so much mail to be carried, there has been this reduction in the rate per ton-mile.

I had always been impressed with the notion that was extant, that every pound of mail carried on a railway train cost the Government from 6 to 8 cents per pound to carry it. That statement has been made in the press; it has found its way into the reports of the Postmasters-General. That statement has been made repeatedly on the floor of this House. My impression is, however, that if you will carefully investigate the matter, you will find that it is untrue that the Government pays to the railroad companies 6 cents, 5 cents, 4 cents, or 3 cents per pound, but that in 1905 the amount per pound that was expended for carrying railway mail only amounted to 2.2 cents per pound.

What is mail? An investigation was made and a weighing was had in 1899 which astounded a great many people. Do you know that according to the weighing that was then made there was actually expended in the United States more money for carrying mail sacks than was paid for carrying the mail? Notice the statement. In 1899 51⅔ per cent of all the mail was sacks. I mean to say that the sacks and pouches were 51⅔ per cent of all the weight of the mail.

Mr. JOHNSON. In weight?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir. I call your attention now to the statement of the weight. The mail was weighed for a period beginning on the 3d day of October and continuing for thirty-five days. The weight for that period was as follows:

	Pounds.
First class	9,000,000
Second class	38,000,000
Second class (free)	3,000,000
Third and fourth class	14,000,000
Government (free)	9,218,000
Equipment	76,806,000

Equipment! Now, what is equipment? Any of us would understand that equipment is not mail, but what is it?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What was the date of that weighing?

Mr. LLOYD. Beginning October 3, 1899, and continuing for thirty-five days. In order to satisfy myself fully as to what equipment was I have obtained from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a statement on that subject, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
DIVISION OF RAILWAY ADJUSTMENT,
Washington, March 30, 1906.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 29th instant, asking as to "what 'equipment' is as used in weighing? Does it consist of anything excepting sacks; if so, what? Is the sack and the mail it may contain weighed separately?" I have to state that in the weighing in each post-office of the country from October 3 to November 6, 1899, the mail was weighed separately from the sack or pouch. The tables on pages 258 and 261 of the report of the Postmaster-General for 1900 (Tables I and M) show the weight of the several classes of mail and also of equipment for the thirty-five days covered by the weighing, together with the estimated weight for the year and the percentage of the several classes of mail and equipment. Table I shows mail for all classes of routes. Table M shows only such matter as was sent to railroads.

In the regular weighings of the mail for the purpose of securing data on which the adjustment of pay for transportation on railroad lines is based the sack and contents are weighed as mail. The term "equipment" or "empty equipment" used in the weight returns covers the empty sacks that are used for car dressing—that is, filling the racks so that the proper and expeditious assortment of the mail may be made, as well as such empty equipment as must be carried to meet the needs of the exchanges at intermediate points on the line. It covers, of course, the mail locks as well as the empty sacks.

Very respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JAMES T. LLOYD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LLOYD. You will observe from this statement that equipment means a sack or pouch, and that at the time of the weighing in 1899 the equipment was a little more in weight than the half of the full weight of mail.

There is another fact to which I want to call attention. That is shown by the table before me. At the time of the weighing there was only 40 per cent of the mails that paid any revenue to the Government. At that time there were 1,565,000,000 pounds of mail matter, but only 40 per cent of it was paying any revenue to the United States. You will notice in the table that I read a moment ago Government free matter. There were 9,000,000 pounds of Government free matter.

According to the same proportion, during the year there would have been 96,000,000 pounds of this class. We are worried now about a deficiency of $14,000,000. In the postal business of last year if the Government had paid its own postage there would be no question about a deficit.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What is the comparative weight of the Government free matter and other free matter? I understand that there are two classes of free matter—one is the newspaper that circulates in the county of publication and the other is the Government matter—and I would like to understand the difference in the weight, if the gentleman can tell me.

Mr. LLOYD. The second-class free matter, which was county papers circulating in the county in which they were published, amounted to 3,140,000 pounds in that thirty-five days. The Government free matter amounted to 9,218,000 pounds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will it disturb the gentleman if I ask him two or three questions?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly not. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any proposition in the pending bill to have the Government send its desks and supplies and everything of that kind either by freight or express instead of through the mail?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; there is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is accomplished, would not that save the Government enough to wipe out the deficiency that there is so much talk about?

Mr. LLOYD. I can not answer that, because there is no data by which we can say how much these supplies that have gone through the mails amount to. There is no doubt but that the War Department and other Departments are sending large amounts of furniture and such things through the mails, but just how much there is of it there is no way to determine. We do not know the amount of it, but we do know that the fact exists that it is done.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would not make any difference until the next weighing period came along, would it?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it would take four years to get rid of the incubus if you start now, but if you do not start in you never would get rid of it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion that the gentleman from South Carolina made about the weighing of the mail is a subject that I want some information about. I have seen the statement somewhere that after the rates were fixed for the transportation of the mails upon the railroads in 1901 that by some order of the Post-Office Department they cut out a lot of second-class matter that had been computed in arriving at the pay that the railroads should receive for the ensuing four years from July 1, 1901, and thereby the railroads were relieved from carrying a great quantity of second-class matter that under the contract they had been required to carry and were actually paid for. Is there anything in that statement or not?

Mr. LLOYD. I hardly think there is any considerable truth in that statement, and yet there is an element of truth in it. But, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the weighing. At the present time second-class mail matter is weighed, and has been for a number of years. We can ascertain how many pounds of that class of mail is carried. We can not ascertain exactly how much of any other kind of mail is carried. I have sought to find out, if it were possible, what was the weight of the mails.

I have been concerned in this argument, if I could do it, to show to every individual, whether he has investigated the subject or not, something about what he pays in dollars and cents and per pound for the mail that is carried. If I say to the average individual that it costs, say, 12 cents per ton-mile to carry mail, then I must try and explain what a ton-mile means. I have been investigating that for about thirty days, and I can hardly find out what a ton-mile is. I observe that Professor Adams, who was employed by the Commission of 1898, states that there were 272,000,000 pounds in ton-miles carried in 1898. How he ascertained that there were 272,000,000 pounds carried a ton-mile I can not explain. There was more mail carried than 272,000,000 pounds, as everybody knows, but I have had difficulty in determining what made a ton-mile in his estimates. I have sought to get down to the practical basis, how much does it cost per pound to carry the mail? We go back to our constituents, to home and friends, who are concerned to know about this matter, and they ask how much is paid for carrying the mail, and I say in response, 10.83 cents per ton-mile. What would they know about it? No more than I do, and I am yet trying to get at what we do pay, as figured out by Mr. Adams, an expert.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not especially important to have this information not only for our constituents, but in order to make a fair estimate to the railroad men of the mail that is carried, and while the mail is being weighed to get at the amount of mail that is to be carried at the various times when the mail is not being weighed? Now, do you pay them by the ton-mile?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. Is the weight made to the Government on that basis?

Mr. LLOYD. No; if you will excuse me, I will explain as best I can how mail is weighed and how we determine the compensation—that is your point?

Mr. STANLEY. No; here is what I want to get at. If you can not determine from the statement of the railroads how much mail is carried in a year, have you any data by which you can tell whether the mail that was carried during the mailing season is greater or less than the amount of mail that is carried at some other month or sixty days in the interim between that and the next weighing?

Mr. LLOYD. No; there is no way of determining that.

Mr. STANLEY. Does it not appear to you that this ton-mile list is a cloak to keep from us that very fact?

Mr. LLOYD. I was undertaking to explain the system of weighing the mail. It is a very complicated method, but I believe a very fair one. I obtained from the Post-Office Department a statement of the weighing of the mails between Quincy, Ill., and St. Joseph, Mo., over the Burlington route, which runs through the district in which I am specially concerned. I find from that statement—they require mail to be weighed for sixty consecutive days—that there was sent out an aggregate amount of mail from Quincy, starting toward St. Joseph, of 811,000 pounds. Now, there was put on at West Quincy, which is the first station after leaving Quincy, 1,360 pounds in the sixty days. In order to obtain the compensation, they multiply that 811,000 pounds by the distance between Quincy and West Quincy, which is two and a half miles. Then they add the 1,360 pounds which was put on at West Quincy. That serves as a basis for computation between West Quincy and the next station, which is Palmyra. Then multiply that sum by the number of miles which intervene between West Quincy and Palmyra. That determines the weight for that distance. At Palmyra there was a very large amount of mail put on and some mail taken off. They find the difference between the two and add that to the amount of mail that was carried between West Quincy and Palmyra. They keep up the process to the end. The same course is pursued on incoming mail. Then they add these several sums together, incoming and outgoing, and divide it by the whole distance, or 206 miles, between Quincy and St. Joseph, Mo.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have a statement here I want to read, and I ask the gentleman, as this is such a complicated matter, if this is a correct definition of what per ton per mile means? It says, "On any route if one multiplies the miles into the daily weight and reduces the product to tons he will have the tons carried a mile a day on that route. Then dividing the yearly payment by the number of days and divide the quotient by that product he will have the price per ton per mile. This is to be done separately on every route."

Mr. STANLEY. That is something like "How old is Ann?"

Mr. LLOYD. That is a correct statement, I think, but if I was going to make that kind of a statement to one of my constituents, what would he say in reply?

Mr. STANLEY. Now, have we any way of determining whether or not the amount of the Government mail——

Mr. NORRIS. I wonder if the gentlemen could not be induced to talk a little bit louder, so that we can hear their conversation? They are not talking above a conversational tone at present.

Mr. STANLEY. I asked if we have any way to determine whether or not the amount of mail that is carried during this carrying period is a fair average of the mail that is sent out by the Government, especially during those periods—for instance, the weight during this sixty days. Now, can you get any record of the amount of mail that is sent out by the Government during that sixty days, or is there any record to determine it?

Mr. LLOYD. No; there is no record of what is in the mail or what went through the mail, except it weighed so many pounds.

Mr. STANLEY. That is all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If my colleague will permit, I think the gentleman appreciates that the weight as found at the time of the weighing period is the minimum for the time, because there is a constant growth in the volume of business. I think it is a little more than the average weight.

Mr. LLOYD. That answers a different question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then I did not understand the question.

Mr. LLOYD. That answers the question asked by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] a short time ago, that if we took out of the mail the carrying of furniture and other things of that kind, if that were withdrawn from the volume, that would be paid for anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This sixty days' weighing, as I understand, is the general weighing that takes place every four years in advance of the letting of these contracts.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir; the United States is divided into four sections, and there is a weighing in one section each year until the four-year period is completed, and then they go back and go over it again.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman has also referred to the thirty-five days' weighing.

Mr. LLOYD. That was a special weighing that was ordered by the commission appointed in 1898 to investigate the railway mail pay.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And in that way they ascertain the weight of the different classes of mail and kinds of mail.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But they do not under the general weighing, as I understand?

Mr. LLOYD. That is right.

Mr. STANLEY. How long was it, if the gentleman will permit me, after the general weighing that this special weighing was made?

Mr. LLOYD. Well, the general weighing, you know, goes on each year.

Mr. STANLEY. For that peculiar section?

Mr. LLOYD. For one-fourth of the country. The weighing takes place early in the year, but this special weighing began on the 3d of October and was completed on the 5th of November.

Mr. STANLEY. Do you know when this special weighing was made in Missouri, and do you know how long this weighing was after the last general weighing took place?

Mr. LLOYD. This particular weighing in Missouri to which you refer was in 1902, three years after the special weighing.

Mr. STANLEY. Three years after the Government weighing?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. Do you know how that weighing compared with the last general weighing?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know; it is very difficult to give an exact answer to that. You can not go back and make a specific computation. It is not decided by the amount put on the train and taken off the train, but is determined by the average amount of mail that is carried from the beginning of the route to the end of the route.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will suggest to my colleague that the general weighing made in this eastern district—the first district, I think it is called—was from September, 1900, to June 30, 1901, and upon that the contracts were let for the four years on July 1, 1901. The special weighing was made in 1899, as the gentleman from Missouri says, from October to November, 1899.

Mr. STANLEY. This special weighing was made by the Government and not by the Department.

Mr. LLOYD. I stated before this interruption began—and I courted the interruption; I am perfectly willing to answer any questions asked if I can do it, because we are all seeking light in this matter——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I want to avail myself of that invitation and ask the gentleman a question. Take a case like this: Now, I understand the mail is weighed in a particular locality every four years.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Supposing the mail going to a certain place during that weighing period amounts to 50,000 pounds. In the succeeding four years there may be an increase in the business of that locality and in the amount of mail carried, and, say, at the end of three years and six months during the same period of time covered by the weighing period it has increased to 100,000 pounds, would the company be paid simply at the rate of 50,000 pounds, or would it be paid on the increased amount?

Mr. LLOYD. They would be paid at the rate of 50,000 pounds until the succeeding weighing period.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Another four years?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Now, I started to try to explain how to determine what is the weight of mail, and when we determine the weight of mail, then we can easily determine how much per pound it costs to carry it. I must say at the outset with reference to this that it must be largely problematical. As I stated some time ago, the second-class mail is weighed from year to year, and we know what that is. Now, in 1899, when all the classes of mail were weighed, 30 per cent—notice the statement, 30 per cent—in round numbers, was second-class mail matter.

Now, I have taken the second-class mail matter in pounds, as it has been determined by the Government, and have determined on that basis of 30 per cent what would be the full weight of mail during the various periods. If the second-class mail is 30 per cent of all that is carried in mail, including equipment, then taking the second-class mail as 3 cents, 10 cents wil be the whole amount of mail carried. I have made a computation for the years 1880, 1885, 1890, 1895, 1900, and 1905 on this basis, and in a table give the weight of the second-class mail, the estimated weight of all mail, the cost of carriage on the railways, and the cents per pound in cost, as follows:

	Pounds.	Pounds.		Cents.
1880	61,322,629	204,480,000	$10,498,986	5.1
1885	101,057,963	336,859,870	16,627,983	4.9
1890	174,046,764	580,153,840	23,395,231	4.3
1895	265,314,382	884,381,270	31,205,342	3.5
1900	382,538,999	1,565,666,508	37,793,981	2.8
1905	618,664,754	2,210,357,000	44,893,960	2.2

According to my estimate we are paying to-day 2½ cents per pound for carrying the mail on the railway trains, rather than 6 or 8 cents, according to the statements that have been made.

Now, it does not follow because of this fact that railway mail pay is not excessive and that it ought not to be reduced. I shall insert in my remarks a statement made by Professor Adams, who is a recognized authority, showing by tables that he has made a comparison between the mail transportation and the express transportation. It is argued, as all of you know, that the railroad companies ought not to receive anything more from the Government for carrying the mail than they receive from the express companies for carrying express matter. Unfortunately, it is impossible for us to determine how much the express companies receive from the people in the transaction of their business.

Mr. RUCKER. Will it disturb the gentleman to go back for a moment?

Mr. LLOYD. No.

Mr. RUCKER. Myself and some of my colleagues are at variance concerning the answer which the gentleman made a while ago. I will assume at first, for convenience, that along a certain line of mail route the weight, as shown by the weighers during this weighing period of sixty days, is 1,000 pounds a day for the sixty days. This forms the basis upon which the contract price for carrying the mail is based.

Mr. LLOYD. No; you take the outgoing mail and the incoming mail.

Mr. RUCKER. Both together, of course.

Mr. LLOYD. Taking the two together, that makes the basis.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, the point I want to get at is this: Suppose that during the next sixty days, instead of the mail carried amounting to 1,000 pounds, it amounts to 2,000 pounds. Does the railroad carry that 2,000 pounds for the same compensation, the same number of dollars, that it carries the 1,000 pounds?

Mr. LLOYD. It gets its pay for four years on the basis of a sixty days' weighing.

Mr. RUCKER. So that if the weight is two times or five times as much, the railroad company gets no more for it than if it just simply continues at the average of 1,000 pounds?

Mr. LLOYD. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to say that it is fixed absolutely at the weight shown by this sixty-day weighing, or do they not calculate upon a percentage of increase each year?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; and the railroad companies complain because they say the Government requires them to carry a great deal of mail for which they receive no pay. Of course we know that the mail increases each year, and they say that they get nothing for carrying this additional weight of mail.

Mr. JOHNSON. As a matter of fact, is not that complaint well founded? Does not each subsequent weighing show an enormous increase in the amount of mail carried? That is to say, all over the United States we know that there is an enormous development of the business of the country, and that the mails carried are increasing very much.

Mr. LLOYD. That is undoubtedly the fact. The mail is increasing all over the country. Now, I stated a moment ago, in the table I had prepared, that the actual amount per pound was 2.2 cents for carrying the mail. It may be said that we ought to take into account other expenses in determining this estimate. They may say that you are talking about mail when the law contemplates equipment as well, and, in fact, the mail pays twice 2.2 cents per pound. There can be no doubt of that proposition, that we actually pay 4.4 cents for every pound of mail that is carried on a railway mail train, because included in the mail, but not a part of it, in fact, is the equipment. That is plain, is it not?

Mr. STANLEY. Right there, you do not approve of that failure to distinguish between them, do you? You think that there should be a distinction between the mail and the sacks in which it is carried.

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, yes.

I called attention a few moments ago to the enormous weight of equipment. There was paid last year for carrying equipment alone, if the same proportion was maintained as in 1899, over $20,000,000. There is certainly no necessity for this extraordinary expenditure. Economy should be sought in this direction. It is a ridiculous proposition that the mail sacks and pouches should cost more in transmission than the mails. There are at the present time over 1,600,000 mail sacks and pouches in use. If these were equally distributed each day and all of them were used and the same amount placed in each sack, there would be less than 2 pounds of mail in each one. I have no doubt that 10 per cent less sacks might be used and accomplish the same purpose as at present. This would save at least $2,000,000 annually. Sacks and pouches can be reduced in weight by making them of lighter material and putting less iron in the fastenings and clasps. It seems to me that at least 25 per cent of weight might be saved if this economy were assiduously attempted. If this were done it would reduce the weight of equipment one-fourth and save $5,000,000 annually to the Treasury. I am pleased to note that this saving has been begun. The recent contracts for mail sacks and pouches are for those much reduced in weight. Those now making weigh on an average a little over 4½ pounds. I have no doubt this can yet be reduced to 3½ pounds without any injury to the service.

If empty sacks were shipped in bulk from mail centers by freight, there ought to be a saving of $1,000,000 more. There is an item in the pending bill which provides for expenditure on this account. In all weighings after this time empty sacks and pouches should be weighed separately, so the Government may ascertain how much it expends in the transportation of empty sacks. I feel sure that reform along these lines would result in a saving to the Treasury of some seven or eight million dollars each year.

It has been ascertained upon inquiry that the Post-Office Department, Treasury officers, Army officers, and other Government employees have, under the laxity of the penalty privilege, sent through the mails free of postage furniture, safes, desks, Army headquarters equipment, Treasury appliances, and very many heavy articles of merchandise. How much of this has been done no one can tell. How much it means in dollars there is no way to accurately estimate, because there is no data at hand for the computation. One thing is sure—it has added much to the weight of the mails and should no longer be tolerated. Such goods should be sent as any private individual would send them. If such things are excluded from the mails, it would save much to the revenue and would reduce the amount to be paid to the railroads.

It is asserted that the best comparison that can be made to determine whether the railroad companies are receiving excessive sums for carrying the mail would be in comparison with express rates and the amount received for passenger traffic. The report of the statistics of the railways for the year 1905 show that the railroads received from the Government for carrying the mails the sum of $44,499,732, and on account of express the sum of $41,875,636. We have no way of ascertaining the amount of business which the railroads did for the express companies, nor the amount received by the express companies for their charges, so that there is no way of ascertaining the exact data with which to make the comparison, excepting as the railroads have reported the amount received for carrying express matter. I wish to call attention at this time to a table begun by Professor Adams, expert accountant for the Commission of 1899, and completed to date, which shows the average amount received per mile for passenger service at different dates, the amount received per ton for freight carried 1 mile, and the amount per ton mail per mile, including postal-car compensation, at various dates.

	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1880	0.0251	0.0129	0.206
1890	.0217	.0094	.1497

[a] 20 per cent. [b] 40 per cent. [c] 47 per cent.

This condensed table will show that passenger rates since 1880 have been reduced 20 per cent, freight rates 40 per cent, and mail compensation 47 per cent. This table is accepted as correct, as I understand it, by everyone, so far as made by Professor Adams. The last statement I have obtained myself. This does not show, of course, that the railroad companies do not receive an excessive sum for carrying the mail, but simply serves to inform us that there has been a greater reduction in mail pay than either passenger or freight receipts during that period.

In the hearings before the Commission of 1898, various comparisons were made of express and passenger receipts and freight rates, all of which tended to show that the railroads received more for carrying express than for carrying the mail, but that the difference was very small. In some instances it was shown that the amount paid for carrying the mail was much less than that received for carrying express. Especially was that true on the route between New York and Philadelphia. There is another element which enters into the problem, which is very difficult to determine. Express companies receive pay for weight and distance, while mail is carried at the same rate per pound without regard to distance. The average distance express is carried is much less than the average haul of mail, but just how much there is no data at hand to determine. It is charged that many items which may be sent either by mail or express are sent by express if the distance is short, and by mail at the greater distance.

In my remarks I have endeavored to present facts rather than arguments. I have tried to call attention to existing conditions, rather than present remedies for existing evils. I have made no demand for reduction of railway mail pay, excepting as the facts developed would indicate its propriety. I have said nothing favorable to the railroads, excepting as the truth shown might indicate it. My own conviction is that more light is needed. The express companies should be required to make public statement of their business just as the railroads and banks are required to do. There should be a complete weight of the mail by classes, and more definite data obtained, so as to determine the rights both of the railroads and the Government. Every critical examination thus far made on the question of railway mail pay has led to uncertainty and doubt as to what was right in the premises.

My colleague on the committee, the Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], in his excellent address on last Saturday, made some statements with reference to second-class mail matter to which I wish to call attention. In speaking of the cost of carrying the second-class matter, he said it was carried at a loss of more than $27,000,000 annually to the Government, and inquired whether such expenditure was not too great a contribution to this class of mail. There were carried last year 663,107,128 pounds of second-class mail matter. If I am not mistaken in the estimate made as to the cost per pound of carrying the mail, this actually cost the Government $14,588,356, and it received in postage on account of it $6,186,647.54; on this estimate, a loss of a little over $8,000,000 for this transportation. In another portion of his address, in discussing the question of the reduction of pay on account of the great weight of the mail, he made this statement: "It is, therefore, an entirely accurate statement to make, that the railroad pay for a large part of the mail they carry is less than 1 cent per pound." If this statement be correct, and I have no doubt that it is, the Government received full compensation for a "large part," to use his language, of the second-class mail matter, because it paid 1 cent per pound.

If the estimate previously made of the reduction since 1900 per pound of mail in transit is correct, if the second-class mail of 1905 had been taken from the mails there would have been the same cost for its transportation as in 1897. This difference would amount to several million dollars and would fully compensate for the difference between the actual payment for the second-class matter and the amount which would have been received if it had paid its full share of railway pay.

I am not much in sympathy with the attack that is made on the second-class mail. Department officers have for years called attention to what they believe is an abuse. This has become somewhat chronic with them. That there are abuses in this branch of the service I have no doubt. It is true that under the guise of a newspaper or magazine many advertising agencies find access to the people with this cheap postage rate. The existing law may not be enforced as rigidly as it should be, in some directions, so as to exclude the great advertising journals; but in this world with nearly every good there is an attendant evil, and while wrongs may creep into the use of second-class mail it is, after all, the most important part of the mail carried so far as general intelligence is concerned.

The greatest civilizing agencies in America, in my judgment, are sent as second-class mail matter. The grandeur and greatness of this Republic, so dear to all our hearts, is due more to that which is carried as second-class mail than to any other agency. This Republic sprang into existence as "the Joshua that commanded the sun and moon to stand still," as expressed by Benjamin Franklin. The independence and intelligence of its citizenship has been its crowning virtue. If its prowess depended on great navies and frowning fortresses, it would stand fifth in the race for preferment. If marshaled hosts and standing armies were the measure of its greatness, then it would sink into insignificance compared with the nations of the world. If ancestral blood and pampered aristocracy are to be the criterion which determine recognition, then Americans must stand aside and allow the royal pageants to pass. But if individual worth and respectability are determining factors, then our Government stands at the head of the column of achievement. This Government is what it is largely because of the public press and the cross-road schoolhouse. To-day the county newspaper circulates free of postage in the county of its publication at an expense to the Government of over $1,000,000. If you had the writing of the law to-day, would you demand postage for this literature? This is the purest and cleanest of public journalism. It is the channel through which the masses are directly reached. It is the thermometer of public thought, the source of intelligence and information, the medium through which the home is reached and the knowledge of local affairs made known. It deserves this recognition and indorsement of its excellent work. It is a business with little of financial profit, engaged in by moral, patriotic, and exemplary men, free from graft and the demoralizing tendencies of the time. The country commends the law which permits the circulation of these papers free of postage in the counties of publication.

Would you in anywise discourage the great daily newspapers by additional postage burdens, that intelligence which finds its way to every village and hamlet, and, since the institution of rural delivery service, into the homes of many of the farmers of the land? These papers may carry too many advertisements, some may go too far in scandal, vilification and abuse, but these mighty engines of influence have the advantage of the mails at the second-class rate and pay only 1 cent a pound postage. Has the Government acted unwisely in fixing this law? Should this body discourage by any act the dissemination of such information? The laborer as he wends his way to his place of business in the city can for a single cent put himself in touch with the doings of the world. As he returns in the evening for another penny he can take to his home the daily paper for his family to read. The farmer now in most localities when he sits with his family around the evening fire can read the same daily paper and inform himself of the doings and thoughts of the world. Would you place any barrier between the publisher and the reader of these great papers by adding additional postage, whether the postal rate is a source of revenue or a means of expense to the Government?

The hated magazine and the great national weekly press, about which we have heard so much in condemnation because of their failure to bear their part of the postal burden, mean much to the reading public. They give to them the deliberate and thoughtful judgment of great students on the issues affecting mankind. Who would take from the second-class mail the Youth's Companion, the Saturday Evening Post, and kindred publications? Why should the North American Review or the Cosmopolitan and other great magazines be deprived of the quickest transit at the present rate? Why does there sit at either end of the Clerk's desk in this House of Representatives the representatives of great press agencies when the general public is excluded from our council? Why is it that a portion of the gallery is set apart for the press whose information circulates as second-class matter? Is it not because this body is concerned that the information which they send to the country should be sent with the utmost dispatch and reach the greatest possible number of homes? In my judgment no expenditure of the Government brings greater returns; no investment means so much in its relation to the home and schoolhouse; none has added more to the sum of individual knowledge, and no step backward should be taken in this contribution to the intelligence and enlightenment of the people.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not often impose myself upon the patience of this body. Experience teaches me that the most effective work is done, not upon the floor of the House by the perpetual talkers, but by the quiet, earnest Members, who attend strictly to their committee work, and give their thought and time to such legislation as properly comes before the committees to which they are assigned.

This country is so big, its interests so varied and so large, that to be successful as a Representative, a Member must make himself a specialist in some particular branch of the service. The age demands high-class specialism, and the man who would make himself felt, either in the nation or as a representative of the people on the floor of this House, must know some one subject, and know it as a specialist.

Not being a member of this committee, I am not as familiar with the provisions of the bill under consideration, carrying as it does nearly $200,000,000 of the people's money, as I am with the bill which has to do with the agricultural interests of the country, and which comes from the committee of which I am a member. Therefore I shall address myself only to that feature of the bill with which I am somewhat familiar on account of the fact that it has to do directly with matters of everyday interest to my district, and in which I have a deep concern.

I wish briefly as possible to discuss the policy of the present Administration with respect to the rural delivery service. Rural delivery was begun as an experiment about ten years ago, Congress appropriating a small sum for that purpose. The Postmaster-General at that time did not think the experiment would prove successful, and for several years the small appropriation given by Congress was not used—the Postmaster-General refusing point-blank to expend this appropriation, giving as his reason for such refusal that he regarded it as an absolute waste of the public money. The friends of the service, however, were not to be put aside from their purpose by the hostile attitude of the Post-Office Department. On the contrary, from year to year the appropriation for rural delivery was increased, and when the Department found that Congress was in earnest about having a fair experiment made, the money was put to the uses for which it was appropriated and our great system of rural delivery was begun.

No branch of the Government has grown so rapidly as this. Starting with an appropriation of $40,000 ten years ago, the appropriation for rural delivery in this bill calls for an expenditure of $28,000,000. There will be in operation by the end of this fiscal year more than 35,000 rural delivery routes, employing about that many people as carriers. The rural districts are rapidly becoming net-worked with postal routes, and the countryman is each day being brought in closer and closer contact with the busy activities of the world. Gentlemen in this debate have referred to this service as a luxury; I agree to that proposition; it is a luxury, but it is more than that—it is a benefit—the greatest benefit to the greatest number of people that the Government has ever undertaken to confer. It is more than a benefit even; it is an undertaking upon the part of the Government to concede to the great agricultural interest of the country a right which has been denied it since the time when the several States joined together for a more perfect Union. It is an evidence of the fact that the representatives of the American people have at last reached a point where they are willing to do exact justice to all classes of the country. It is the doing of a tardy justice to that class which contributes more than any other to the nation's wealth and glory.

The wisdom of tuose who fought for rural delivery in its inception, their courage in standing up for it in the face of the cold-water policy of the Department, finds justification in the rich fruits it is now bearing. Rural delivery has enhanced from 20 to 50 per cent the value of the farmer's land, and brought him in daily touch with the markets of the world, affording him the advantage of their rapidly changing conditions from day to day. It has become a great university in which 36,000,000 of our people receive their daily lessons from the newspapers and magazines of the country. It is the schoolhouse of the American farmer, and is without a doubt one of the most potent educational factors of the time.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to be forced to believe that the policy of the Post-Office Department at this time is unfriendly, if not actually hostile, if not to a continued existence of the service, then, at least, to a legitimate and reasonable extension of it. My experience with officials in charge of this service leads me to the conclusion that the Department has adopted a policy of repression, if not retrogression, with respect to it.

The regulations of the Department touching the inauguration of new service, I assert, are calculated to bring about delay and to stand between the expressed wishes of the people and the right which they deserve to expect from the Government. The present Postmaster-General evidently has thought it incumbent upon him to call a halt upon the rapidity of the growth of the service, and his policy is doing this most effectively.

Let us illustrate by example the miserable policy of delay now pursued by the Post-Office Department. A community wishes rural delivery. Some enterprising citizen writes his Congressman to that effect and at once a blank petition prepared by the Department is returned. It is necessary that this petition be signed, if the route is of the maximum length of 24 miles, by at least 100 persons. The petition is then returned to a Senator or Congressman, whose favorable indorsement is required as a condition precedent to consideration by the Department. There can be no complaint as to this rule. It is reasonable, as expressive of the will of the people by their chosen Representative, and, in addition, tends to expedition in the inauguration of the service.

Under the old rule of the Department the petition was at once referred to one of its field agents with instructions that the feasibility of the service be investigated as soon as possible.

Under the present policy of repression, however, the officials in charge, acting presumably under orders from the Postmaster-General, take this petition and go over it name by name, and I do not know but that they employ a handwriting expert, and if it is found that the petition is in the handwriting of only one person, then it is returned to the postmaster at the point from which the service is petitioned, with the demand that the petition be returned signed in the handwriting of the petitioners. I do not know what was in the mind of the Department when this new rule was adopted, but I do know that it convicts the Department of one of two things—either a purpose to delay the inauguration of the service as much as possible, for the going of this petition back and forth between the Department and petitioners requires from two to three weeks of time, or it convicts the Department of adopting a policy which is without sense or reason. Those of us who are familiar with country life can well understand how natural it is for the farmer, who may be in the field, or whose hands are soiled from the work being done, to ask the person in charge of the petition to sign for him. This is natural, and if the Department had any appreciation or understanding of country life, it would know this and abandon this new regulation. But, in my humble judgment, the Department does understand the American farmer, knows all about him, and the rule is adopted, not because of a lack of understanding in this respect, but for the sole purpose of causing delay and retarding and holding back the inauguration of the service where it has been petitioned for, on the grounds of mere departmental technicality. Now, then, when these handwriting experts have been satisfied that the petition is genuine, it is then referred to another branch of the Department, and from there it goes to a special agent in the field. In the meantime, when the petition is going this sinuous course, and butting through these walls of obstruction and delay, two and sometimes three months have gone by and the petitioners must patiently wait.

After the departmental critics can discover no further flaws in the petition, the special agent takes it in hand and the territory to be investigated will be reached by him perhaps within six weeks or two months. The special agent, who is usually a most intelligent and conscientious and liberal man, goes over the ground carefully, examines the local conditions, inquires into the particular need for the service, talks with the people along the proposed route, and thereby gets the correct point of view from which to decide as to the feasibility of the service, its necessity, and whether or not the people will patronize it. In his report to the Department he fully covers all these points, so that there can be no reason for any lack of information by officials of the Department. By the time the agent gets the petition and has made this report not less than four months, and sometimes six, have elapsed since it was properly signed by the people interested and sent to the Department through their Representative.

The petition is again in the Department with the favorable report of the Department's own agent, who knows the local situation and the necessity for the service, and whose judgment is usually reliable. The cause for complaint now begins. The petition has reached the hands of the red-tapists—the fellow who either knows nothing of rural conditions, or cares nothing about them, the official who can see no special reason for facilitating consideration, but is willing to allow the petition and the report of the agent to lie in the office to become covered with dust and cobwebs, while the taxpayer, the citizen, is patiently waiting for the service which belongs to him as a matter of justice and right. After the petition has soaked for several months in the Department or is groping about in the mystic maze of its divisions and bureaus, the officials, paid by the money of the people and presumed to be interested in the work of expediting the business of the people, begin to bestir themselves. They move with a slowness, it is true, which can only serve the purpose of holding out the hope to the anxious people that there is still left in this ponderous machine a small spark of vitality. If a Member of Congress is sufficiently energetic to go to the Department six times a week, he may be able, by prodding and begging and cajoling, to hasten somewhat the movements of this machine. I warn gentlemen not to make the mistake of expecting any results by mere letters written in behalf of petitioners. These will avail nothing. You must see these people and help them solve the great mystery of doing the simplest thing on earth. A letter brings nothing in return save a stereotyped answer to the effect that "the matter will be given consideration in the due course of time."

The report of the agent is gone over carefully, critically, deliberately, and painfully slow, and if the eye of the Department detects a single technical flaw in the report, the petition is again referred to the agent in the field for what the Department calls "a supplemental report." The whole process must be gone through with again, and to get a supplemental report requires as much time as to get an original one, and it frequently happens that many months are wasted, and the inauguration of the service, to that extent, delayed because of some red-tape objection raised against the report of the agent. I have known it to happen that one petition has had to run the gantlet of four investigations by the field agent before the departmental critics were satisfied that no further reason for delay could be found. If no supplemental report is necessary, the recommendations of the agent are considered by the officials of the Department, and after they have concluded that no valid reason exists for their not taking the next step in the process, the postmaster at the initial point of the proposed route is called upon for a certificate as to the number of people who will signify their willingness to patronize it. If upon the return of this certificate—and this, of course, takes time and is a needless delay—it is shown that three-fourths of the entire number of families are willing to patronize the route, the petition receives the departmental O. K. The postmaster is notified that the route will be established, and the Civil Service Commission is called upon to hold an examination for a carrier.

The civil service performs its part in complicating this already complicated web with reasonable expedition. It usually takes not less than six weeks to hold this examination and appoint a carrier.

It is hardly necessary to argue that this machinery is complicated, cumbersome, and calculated to give rise to unnecessary delay in the inauguration of service. From the date of filing the petition to the date of inauguration of the service most usually takes twelve months, and I have a case in my own district in which it took the Department almost that length of time, after receipt of the favorable report of the agent, to get everything in readiness for the inauguration of the service. In the meantime the farmer, whose mail is as important to him as the mail of a Wall street banker or stock gambler, who gets a delivery from nine to twelve times a day, is denied the blessings of this service in order that the unwarranted obstacles of a picayunish policy may be met and overcome.

Mr. Chairman, I assert without fear of contradiction, that no man who has ever followed a petition through this departmental labyrinth can honestly say that he believes the service is being conducted with a view of expedition, and with a sincere purpose of expanding the service so that everyone, everywhere, may receive its benefits in the shortest possible time. You are forced to the conclusion that this whole Department is honeycombed with red tape, delay, and a lack of business method that is exasperating in the extreme, both to the people and to one who represents a district and is anxious to serve it in a businesslike manner.

This rule of requiring three-fourths of the patrons to certify their willingness to patronize the route as a condition precedent to its establishment is a new rule and in line with the present policy of repression in the administration of this service. It is the offspring of the present administration of this great Department, which touches more people and is more intimately associated with and interwoven into the social and economic life of the nation than any other Department of the Government.

Under the former administration of this service it was left to the discretion of the special agent, who went over the territory, saw the people and the houses they live in and the manner of their living, and could best judge of their circumstances and the appreciation they would likely have of rural service, to say whether or not the route would receive that reasonable patronage which would warrant its establishment. The discretion, as was wise and sensible, was lodged in the man whose personal observation entitled his judgment to be binding upon those in the Department, who had no personal knowledge of the actual conditions. The final decision, of course, was reserved for the Department, but that was usually in accord with the recommendations of the agent. Under the new régime the agent has become a mere figurehead, whose reports have become the victims of departmental technicality. The man to whom we pay from fourteen to sixteen hundred dollars a year, in order that we may have his judgment as to the appreciation the people will have for rural service, among other things, is almost entirely ignored upon this point. That he makes a favorable report upon a petition at all ought to be sufficient evidence to the Department that all the requirements have been met and that the necessity exists for the immediate inauguration of service. The agent is the man who knows, and his judgment ought not to be set aside, except when it appears on the face of the report that he is clearly wrong. This new rule concentrates all the authority in respect to this service in the Department, and these men, who can have no idea of the necessity of the service and the conditions which would warrant it in any particular case, are permitted to override the judgment and hamper the efficiency of the agent in extending service. The result is delay, exasperating and unwarranted.

It can not be argued that this three-fourths-certificate rule was promulgated for the purpose of increasing the patronage of rural service, for the administration of it proves the contrary. The rule is enforced with an exactness that would do justice to a Shylock. The Department invariably demands its pound, and I have actually in my own experience had it to happen that a certificate was returned to the postmaster for additional names, when only two names more were necessary to bring it within the rule. A delay of three or four weeks was occasioned and the people denied the privilege of the service for that time because of this illiberal and narrow construction of the rule. But what does the Department care about delay! It is not interested in the extension of the service, if we are to judge by its action; it exists for the purpose of retarding the extension of service. No other class of people on earth would stand for this, except the patient American farmer, and no other Department of the Government would dare to perpetrate this senseless interpretation of a clearly senseless rule. Why should fifty substantial, intelligent American citizens, with every right belonging to American citizens, with every right belonging to taxpayers—willing contributors to the national burden—with every right to this service, have it withheld from them because, perchance, twenty-five other men on the proposed route do not certify their willingness at the time to patronize it? Why should seventy-three citizens be denied the blessings of a daily mail because, perchance, only two people on the proposed route refuse to enter into a binding contract with the Federal Government to patronize a service which at the time they know nothing about? Yet it frequently happens that this is the case, according to the strict interpretation of this rule. The truth is there is no sense and less justice in it; and I firmly believe it was conceived in the general purpose to delay the inauguration of rural service, to hamper its establishment with hard conditions, and to withhold its legitimate extention wherever it is possible to do so by mere technical rules. The Congress which appropriates the money for this service and is representative of the will of the people did not intend, and does not intend, I hope, that it shall be surrounded with a wall of red tape and unreasonable rules in order that the people may be kept from its benefit.

Personally I have no quarrel with the Department. I think they give me the same consideration they give other Representatives. For the gentlemen in charge of this service I have the highest personal regard. They are courteous, agreeable, and always willing to accord such help and information as they can give. The special agents of the Department are particularly clever gentlemen, and their reports are usually fair and just, and give evidence of an earnest desire to discharge their full duty conscientiously and with a due regard for both the interests of the people and the service. The gist of my complaint is against the system and whoever is responsible for it.

The place of delay in the inauguration of this service is here in the Department itself. The injustice done the people is committed after the petition leaves the hands of the agent and reaches the Department, where it must go through the slow grinding mill of red-tapism. The discretion lodged in the Department is too great, their power is too unlimited. That they should abuse it is not unnatural; that they should mistake their own character and imagine themselves masters rather than servants of the people is not surprising. Wherever in all history there has been lodged great power there has always been found more or less abuse of it.

This idea suggests that we, as representatives of the people, charged with the high duty of legislating in the interests of the people, are not without fault in contributing to the abuses which have grown up in the Department by our failure to enact general legislation to govern the service. By our failure to act we have thrown the burden of administering this great service into the hands of the Department without a single suggestion as to how the enormous sum we each year appropriate shall be used. We have said to the Department, in effect, "Here are $28,000,000; use it as seems wisest to you, only use it for the benefit of the rural delivery service." It was my earnest hope that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would bring to the attention of the House and for its consideration some comprehensive plan looking to the better organization and administration of this service. Congress must act in this matter sooner or later, and the sooner the better. We can not much longer justify our inaction. The responsibility is upon us of saying in what manner the people's money shall be spent. We can not longer shirk the duty we owe in this respect.

But, Mr. Chairman, to return to the policy of the Department, let me say that it is evident that they are not satisfied with making hard conditions precedent for the establishment of rural service, but they have adopted a plan for the future, according to the report of the Postmaster-General, which will mean the discontinuance of thousands of rural delivery routes now in operation, especially in the South, where the patronage of rural service is not as large as that given it in some other sections of the country. The Postmaster-General, in his report, page 93, announces the policy of the Department in this language:

> The discontinuance without delay of any route where it is found on inspection that because of a lack of appreciation of the service the expenditure involved is unwarranted.

Again, he says:

> The substitution of every-other-day service where the patronage is not sufficient to warrant daily service, thereby discontinuing the employment of a carrier.

This announcement of the Postmaster-General's policy for the future gave rise to a perfect furor of alarm throughout the country. The people and the press voiced their disapproval in no uncertain language, and Members of Congress were deluged with protests and inquiries. Everybody, with the solitary exception of the Post-Office Department, saw the unreasonableness and injustice of such a course.

Anxious to know what interpretation the officials in immediate charge of this service would put upon the announcement of the Postmaster-General, I wrote to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General in January and received this letter in reply, and for the information of the House I shall read it in full, as it touches the points involved:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
DIVISION OF RURAL FREE DELIVERY,
Washington, January 22, 1906.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have your letter of the 13th instant, in which you state it is generally understood that there is in progress an inspection of rural delivery routes with a view to discontinuing or reducing to triweekly service such of them as show little patronage, and asking to be advised as to the policy of the Department in this regard.

In reply you are advised that the inspection of the service which has been instituted is with a view to ascertaining the cause for any adverse conditions which may exist and the possibility of removing such conditions. On discovering that there is a lack of patronage on a given route consideration is given, first, to the possibility of increasing the interest in the service on the route; second, to the possibility of rearranging the route so as to increase the patronage; third, to the possibility of establishing every-other-day service in lieu of daily service, and, last, to its discontinuance where the conditions are such that the expenditure involved in the operation of the route is unwarranted.

In this connection attention is respectfully invited to the report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, a copy of which is forwarded to you under separate cover, page 93. While no fixed rule as to the amount of mail which should be handled on a rural route has been adopted, still the Department feels that the average rural route should handle 3,000 pieces of mail per month, with a possible minimum of 2,000, but the question of the discontinuance of the service on routes must in all cases depend upon the conditions as they exist on such routes, and the expenditure involved in operating the service on a given route might not be deemed warranted, even though the minimum of 2,000 pieces of mail per month were handled, where it was found that a considerable number of the possible patrons were not availing themselves of the benefits of the service.

As to your inquiry relative to the section of the country which shows the least patronage of rural delivery, I have to say that the Department is not in possession of data as to the number of families patronizing all routes. The average amount of mail handled per route is not an absolute indication as to whether there is a lack of patronage, as a given number of people on one route may take more mail than the same number on another route.

The States included among those handling less than an average of 3,000 pieces of mail per route per month are Indian Territory, 2,806; Kentucky, 2,785; Florida, 2,515; Tennessee, 2,497; Louisiana, 2,411; South Carolina, 2,407; Oklahoma, 2,394; Texas, 2,383; District of Columbia, 2,370; Georgia, 2,147; Arkansas, 2,067; Virginia, 2,015; Alabama, 1,989; North Carolina, 1,909; Mississippi, 1,758.

Very respectfully,

P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

This is a most interesting document and discloses a policy which must alarm every friend of rural delivery. You will notice that the Department intends through a rigid inspection of the service to ascertain if the appreciation of it is such as to warrant the expenditure necessary for its continuance. They set up an indefinite standard by which the appreciation of the service is to be measured, and this standard is predicated upon the idea that the appreciation of the service must be shown in the patronage of it, as shown by the number of pieces of mail handled, and this, in the last analysis, means the measure of appreciation in the amount of cancellation. A money value is to be put upon appreciation. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Post-Office Department has never been run with a view to making money. It exists because it is the function of the Government to supply its people with adequate mail facilities; and only once or twice in its history has it failed to show a deficit of receipts over expenditures. The Department was established for the purpose of making the social intercourse between the people of the country inexpensive and easy, for promoting commerce, and for the general welfare, education, and convenience of the people. The idea of making the service self-sustaining has never entered the brain of any Administration save this one. Deficits running in amounts from $3,000,000 to $14,000,000 per annum have not alarmed the people, and have occasioned no special complaint. It seems to me that if reforms are necessary in the Post-Office Department, and I have no doubt of that, the Administration could find some other service than this to begin with. If I had the time, I think I could call their attention to some abuses which might engage them for at least a short while. No one expects that rural delivery will become self-sustaining in a short decade. It is a new service, and its growth must be gradual. It is absurd for the Department to promulgate a rule that a route must be discontinued, where it does not appear that it is handling from 2,000 to 3,000 pieces of mail per month. A strict enforcement of such a rule would practically discontinue all of the routes recently put in in the South. No new service is at once patronized generally. The patronage increases from day to day as the service becomes more and more appreciated, and as the people become more and more satisfied that the service is to be permanent. When route No. 1 at Columbia, in my district, was established there was but one newspaper delivered along its whole length. The people had not come to appreciate the service. After it had been in operation for some little time, however, the mail handled began to increase, and during the quarter ending December 31 last, the carrier on this same route delivered 4,921 newspapers, aside from the other mail. If the Department, when this service was put into operation, had been enforcing this new rule, this route would have been discontinued. I believe the day will come when rural delivery will be self-sustaining, for as the people become more educated, and as newspapers and magazines become to them more of a necessity, they will more and more use the facilities which the Government has put at their doors.

I deny to the Department the right to set a standard of appreciation of this service. I deny it the right of exercising a discretion in a matter about which it can know nothing. How can the Department know what value you or I put upon a letter or a newspaper? It may be that we do not get but one letter a week, but that letter may mean a great deal to us. How can the Department know otherwise? The poor widow living on a rural route, whose boy is at college or in a distant city toiling for his support and hers, may not write many letters and may not receive many, but can it be said that she does not appreciate those she gets from that boy as much or more than does the Wall street broker, whose letters are counted in hundreds? You can not measure the appreciation of this service by the amount of mail handled nor by the cancellation. The power should not be lodged in the Department to say to the people, "You do not appreciate what we are giving you, and therefore we will take it away." The Department must understand that it is not giving to these people anything, for the money which goes to the support of this service comes from the people, and they have a right to expect that some of it, at least, be returned to them.

But, Mr. Chairman, this letter discloses another fact to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. I quote: "While no fixed rule as to the amount of mail which should be handled on a rural route has been adopted," and then the Fourth Assistant states what he conceives to be a reasonable average for each route, and then goes on to couple with his first statement the following: "Where it was found that a considerable number of the possible patrons not availing themselves of the benefit of the service," the route would be considered with a view to its discontinuance. In other words, a route may handle 3,000 pieces of mail per month, and yet if this amount is not sufficiently large to meet the expectations of the Department the service, in the discretion of the Department, can be discontinued. A more indefinite and uncertain rule could not be found. It lodges in the discretion of the Department the right to set up a standard of possible patronage which may be the guide in your community, while a different standard would be the guide in another section. The rule is absolutely unreasonable, and it permits the Department a power of discrimination which can be used to the great injustice of certain sections of the country. This rule does not take into consideration the fact that there may be a possible patronage of 100 people to a route, but for some reason only twenty-five are patronizing it, but these may be taking daily newspapers and the great magazines of the country; their homes may be model homes, and their children in college. The Department, in its discretion, has the right to discontinue the service to these twenty-five people, who are proving themselves worthy of every consideration, because the route does not show the largest possible patronage. Who will say that such an act would not work an injustice? Who will deny such a discretion as this ought not to be lodged in any bureau chief?

This letter announces another rule to the effect that the Department, in its discretion, may reduce the service from daily to triweekly. This is in violation of the fundamental idea of this service. The whole system of rural delivery contemplates that the American farmer shall have his mail delivered at his door at least once a day. It was the intention of the fathers of this system that a daily mail should go to the man living in the rural districts, and it was not in the mind of Congress, when these appropriations had been made from time to time, that they should be used for the purpose of inaugurating tri-weekly service. Here we have another instance of an abuse of power by a great Department of the Government, and gives another evidence of the necessity for legislation on that subject.

Mr. Chairman, this letter of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General shows another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the House. In writing General De Graw, I asked him to furnish me the names of the States in which there seemed to be the least appreciation of rural service as shown by the amount of patronage. I confess that I was not surprised, for I suspected that the state of facts as shown by the Fourth Assistant's letter was perhaps the reason for the rule, when I found him writing that "the States included among those handling less than 3,000 pieces of mail per route per month are Indian Territory, Kentucky, Florida, Tennessee, Louisiana, South Carolina, Oklahoma, Texas, District of Columbia, Georgia, Arkansas, Virginia, Alabama, North Carolina, Mississippi." Thus we see that the solid Democratic South falls within this arbitrary and suspicious rule of the Department. Not a single State among those mentioned in this letter is above the historic line of Mason and Dixon, and I feel that I am justified in the suspicion that this new regulation was adopted for the purpose of perpetuating the policy of discrimination against the South, which has been pursued by the Department since the beginning of this service. I am not building straw men for the purpose of knocking them down, but the records of the Department will bear me out in the statement that this service has been administered in a sectional and partisan manner. And let me say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that but for the zeal and energy of Southern Representatives in Congress rural delivery would not to-day be in existence. It was a southern man who first proposed it to the Congress and southern men have been its most zealous friends and advocates.

Some years ago I undertook in an argument in the House to show that even then a policy of discrimination against the South had been adopted by the Post-Office Department. I think the fact was demonstrated by the records of the Department, beyond the shadow of a doubt. There has been no change in the attitude of the Department toward the South since that time. The records of the Department will show to-day that 50 per cent of adverse reports upon rural delivery petitions come from the South, while 10 per cent will cover the adverse reports from other sections of the country. The number of routes in operation in Southern States are 50 per cent less than the number in operation in Northern and Western States of equal population and density of population. In the twelve so-called Southern States, with a population of 21,713,000, in round numbers, there were in operation on January 2, 1906, 8,695 routes, while in the four States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and Kansas, with a population of 11,638,000, in round numbers, there were in operation, on the same date, 8,510. These four States, with only half the population, have as many routes in operation as all of the Southern States combined. In the South there is a rural route in operation for every 2,500 of its population, while in the four States mentioned there is a route in operation for every 1,400 of population. The State of Kansas, as rock-ribbed and everlasting in her republicanism as South Carolina is in her democracy, and with a population of only 130,000 more than South Carolina, had in operation 1,555 routes, as against 532 for South Carolina—a difference of over a thousand routes in favor of Republican Kansas. In South Carolina there is only one rural route for every 2,500 of population, while the unit of population for rural service in Kansas is only 950, and the density of population of South Carolina is greater, by far, than that of Kansas. Republican Oklahoma, with a population of only 398,000, has in operation 594 routes—62 routes more than in my own State, with a population four times as great. These comparisons could be carried out ad infinitum and each one would demonstrate the fact that the service has been administered in a partisan and sectional manner that is disgraceful to any government.

This new rule of the Department setting a standard for the number of pieces of mail to be handled on a route is calculated—I fear deliberately intended—to continue this policy of sectional and partisan administration of the service.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for my section nothing more and nothing less than common justice—the application of the much-vaunted "square-deal" principle. We are in the Union; we are here to stay. Your flag is our flag; your country is our country. To its welfare we owe our contributions, and we give them; to its defense we owe our lives, and we have given them. And it does seem to me that the day has come when we should cease to pay the penalty for having had the courage to fight for our conception of right and in defense of a principle which has successfully met every adversary, save that of force alone. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

[Mr. FINLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and the gentleman from Tennessee not desiring to use any further time, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department, in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, some time ago—to be accurate, on December 13, 1905—I introduced in this House a resolution calling on the Secretary of State for all letters, dispatches, documents, correspondence, papers, and information between this Government and Austria-Hungary in the case of Marcus Braun, a special immigration inspector of the United States, who was arrested at the instigation of the Austro-Hungarian Government in Budapest, in the month of May, 1905, while in the performance of his official duties in that country. That arrest was unwarranted and unjustifiable, and the Austro-Hungarian Government subsequently apologized for the arrest and reprimanded its officials who caused it.

The resolution, sir, I introduced passed the House unanimously, went to the Secretary of State, and in response thereto that official forwarded to the Congress what purported to be all the papers and documents in this case; but I am reliably informed that the most important document, a letter from Consul-General Chester, at Budapest, which gave his views of the case and set forth in detail all the facts in this matter, was withheld. Why that important letter, so far as Mr. Braun is concerned, was suppressed I do not know, and I do not intend at this time to talk about it. The other papers and documents in this matter have been printed and are on file. They are known as House Document No. 482, printed February 8, 1906. Mr. Braun has answered it specifically, and filed his answer in the State Department.

The facts in the case very briefly are as follows: On the afternoon of May 8, 1905, Marcus Braun, then a guest of the Hotel Hungaria, in the city of Budapest, Hungary, saw one of the State detectives of the Hungarian Government, by the name of Hugo Kalmar, taking out of the letter box of the hotel and reading Mr. Braun's personal and official letters. The detective was just in the act of reading a letter written from Dr. Frank Dyer Chester, United States consul-general at Budapest, to Mr. Braun, relating to emigration matters in Hungary, which Mr. Braun was at the time officially investigating on behalf of the United States Government.

Many weeks before, let me say, Mr. Braun had complained to the United States consul-general at Budapest, to the Hon. Bellamy Storer, United States ambassador at Vienna, and to the Commissioner-General of Immigration of the United States, Washington, that his mail, both official and private, was tampered with, but up to that time he was under the impression that the spoliation of his letters was caused by petty post-office officials, but when he caught Detective Kalmar red-handed in the act he had positive evidence that the unlawful opening of his mail was caused directly by the Austro-Hungarian Government.

Mr. Braun recognized in the person of this detective a man who for weeks prior to this incident had followed him on all the trips he was making in the capacity of United States immigrant inspector throughout that country, and when he caught this detective in the act of rifling his letters he gave expression to his indignation and denounced the act as outrageous, and immediately telegraphed to the United States ambassador at Vienna and to his superiors at Washington for protection.

The day following, namely, on the 9th day of May, Mr. Braun was served with a summons to appear before the police captaincy of the fourth district of the city of Budapest, on May 10, to answer a charge of insulting a Hungarian official. Consul-General Chester went with Mr. Braun to the chief of police, Mr. Bela Rudnay, to demand an explanation, and he also called on the councilor of the ministry of interior, Dr. Alexander Selley, and at both places they practically admitted that Mr. Braun was under arrest, and considered by them as a private, and not an official person, for the purpose of detecting him in some offense against the Hungarian emigration law, and to make his further stay impossible in that country as an American inspector of immigration.

The evidence secured by Mr. Braun and Consul-General Chester showed conclusively that the reason for this action by the Hungarian Government was that Mr. Braun's official reports of 1904 had hurt the feelings of several prominent officials in the Adrea Steamship Company, which is a concern subsidized by the Hungarian Government, in which many of the highest officials of the Kingdom of Hungary are shareholders. At the beginning both the ministry of interior and the police department, including Detective Kalmar, denied the fact that they had opened Mr. Braun's mail or followed him around, but when they were confronted with the positive evidence in Mr. Braun's possession they made a brazen stand and said: "Well, we had a perfect right to do that. What are you going to do about it?"

By direct order of Prime Minister Tisza the police department issued official statements to the press against Mr. Braun impugning his character, and paid the expenses for printing and circulating a pamphlet, which was sold openly all over the Kingdom, containing all kinds of false charges against the honor and integrity of Mr. Braun.

Subsequently Mr. Braun was discharged, and the officials responsible for his arrest reprimanded by the Austro-Hungarian Government. These are briefly the facts in this case. However, among the papers sent to this House by the Secretary of State, in response to my resolution, is a letter from Mr. Storer, the then ambassador of the United States to Vienna, unjustly reflecting on Mr. Braun. In answer to this letter, and to its reply by the then Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, and in answer to all the papers on file in the State Department, especially to these sent to the House of Representatives by the present Secretary of State and contained in House Document No. 482, Mr. Braun promptly filed his reply, and I shall ask the House, ere I conclude, for its permission to include this reply in the RECORD as part of my remarks. I believe a great injustice has been done Mr. Braun, and I think he is entitled to have his side of the case presented to the country in his own way and in his own words. To do less would be a denial of justice and a refusal to give him his day in court before the American people. This reply speaks for itself, and is Mr. Braun's defense and complete vindication.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in regard to Mr. Braun that on account of the outrageous way he has been treated by certain officials of this Government, and on account of the fact that he could not get protection and vindication from those in authority, who should safeguard his rights as an official and as an American citizen, he has resigned from the office he held, and is no longer in the employ of the United States Government. It may also not be amiss to call to the attention of the Members of this House the fact that Mr. Bellamy Storer, the American ambassador to Austro-Hungary, has been summarily dismissed from the diplomatic service by the President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, just a few words in conclusion. I want to say that Mr. Braun lives in my district, and has always been an intense and consistent Republican. But politics has nothing to do with this matter. While I am a Member of Congress I shall always do everything in my power to secure justice for my constituents and to vindicate the rights of every man, woman, and child that lives in my Congressional district, regardless of politics, race, or religion. I know Marcus Braun well, and I can testify that he is able, sincere, industrious, intelligent, and affable, and one of the most patriotic and loyal men in all the land. He is entitled to a "square deal," and I shall do all that I can to get it for him. He has been an honest and an efficient official of this Government for several years, and has won the esteem of his official superiors. He is a friend of President Roosevelt, who reposes in him the most implicit confidence. The charges filed against him secretly in the State Department by the Austro-Hungarian Government are absolutely false, and that Government knows the charges to be false. A great wrong and a great injustice has been done Mr. Braun, and he demands that all the papers in this matter filed in the State Department be given the fullest publicity, so that the truth shall be known, and in order that an honest official and a worthy citizen may be vindicated in the eyes of every true American. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent that the letter of resignation and the reply of Mr. Braun to the documents the Secretary of State sent to the House may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NEW YORK, March 10, 1906.

Hon. F. P. SARGENT,
Commissioner-General of Immigration,
Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In the administration of justice the protection of innocence is as much the province of the law as is the punishment of crime; and in the administration of executive offices the appreciation of work performed is of as great, if not infinitely greater, importance as is the payment of the salary.

This appreciation of services faithfully and loyally rendered can not evidence itself in a more thorough manner than in identifying the labor of the servant as that of the master, and by giving the laborer the power and the authority of those for whom he is at work, and to extend to him, while at work, the broadest protection of those in authority.

One in the service of the United States must feel that he has the power of all the United States at his command, if need be, while faithfully performing his duty. The moment this protection is not at his command—that is to say, not at his disposition—from that moment his usefulness is perceptibly shaken. If such a man deemed himself in need of the protection of his Government, if he called for it and prayed for it, and it was denied him, still more glaringly does the usefulness of that man diminish until it arrives at nil. Then there remains but one manly course open—to retire from his work.

Sir, I am in that position. True, at one time I was told by you that I have performed good work and you did assure me "that some day the merits of my work would be recognized in proper manner," but that future appreciation of my work is of insignificant importance in comparison to my present position, when I am left helpless by the Department to which I appealed for protection against cowardly, brutal attacks upon my honor, and when, against my earnest and solemn protestations, it was allowed to go forth to the world as the last word and "the incident considered closed," that Braun was guilty "of highly improper conduct as an official of the United States engaged in a mission in Hungary, * * * and that his antecedents are not such as to require any further action * * *," conclusions arrived at without my being heard, conclusions based on wickedly false and deliberately malicious and lying statements.

True, I did receive a certain vindication, but the very vindication accorded to me was a veiled injury. When I had heretofore resigned my position I was promptly reappointed; but it was only the salary that was given to me; the kind of work and the nature of the work I had been doing was not again intrusted to me, while the vindication due to me, as I think, should have carried with it the assignment to the very sphere of work I had been performing.

However, American officeholders do not, generally, hold office as a matter of idealism, nor do I, and I would have gladly yielded this point of change of assignment and would have been contented to fill my office, be it in Canada or Granada, New York or Budapest, had the assignment to any work, anywhere, been followed up by the examination of the charges, or, rather, innuendoes, upon which the coordinate branch of the Government acted in a manner to which I can not submit, unless indeed I wished to plead guilty to "improper conduct" or to "shady antecedents." No office to which I could be appointed vindicates me as long as those charges are not exposed to be malicious falsehoods, and I believe I have proven that by documents in possession of the Government.

I have petitioned, pleaded, and implored for a chance to be heard in my defense, but in vain. I was told that "the incident is closed," that I have been reappointed to my old office; that should suffice to make me feel that no further vindication is necessary.

Well, this is a question to which I can respond in but one way. Absolutely exonerating you, sir, from any and all responsibility, and extending to you my most heartfelt and grateful appreciation of your kindness to me, but in view of my earnest appeals for a hearing being disregarded by the Department of State, to which I had submitted them weeks ago, in view of my reappointement to an office, carried with it by an assignment entirely different from the kind to which I thought I was to have been appointed, surely different from the kind of work I had been doing, I pray to be allowed to tender, and I do now so tender, my resignation as immigrant inspector, my resignation to take effect on March 20, 1906, on the day of the expiration of the leave of absence I now enjoy.

Respectfully,

MARCUS BRAUN,
United States Immigrant Inspector.

Marcus Braun's answer filed in the Department of State, Washington, D. C.

78 SECOND AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY,
February 21, 1906.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Document No. 482 of the first session, Fifty-ninth Congress, House of Representatives, entitled "Marcus Braun—Message from the President of the United States," has this day reached me.

The document closes with a letter of the late Secretary of State, John Hay, of glorious memory, addressed to Mr. Storer, our ambassador at the Court of the Hapsburgs, at Vienna, wherein the American statesman informs the ambassador that, inasmuch as it appears from the "correspondence that Braun was guilty of highly improper conduct as an official of the United States engaged in a mission in Hungary in openly attacking the Hungarian Government in the newspapers, and that his antecedents are not such as to require any further action than the proper assertion of the dignity of the United States, and inasmuch as Braun has been recalled and the offending petty officials have been reprimanded by the Imperial Government, the Department does not feel that it is desirable to press the matter further with the Austro-Hungarian Government. For these reasons you may let the matter drop."

Our Mr. Storer has, in supplying the State Department with the information upon which the lamented late Secretary of State thought himself to be justified to close the incident in the manner in which he did, lent himself—I have no doubt that he did so unconsciously—to the commission of a most flagrant miscarriage of justice of which I have been the victim.

He had been misled by deceitful people; his ear had been filled with malicious slanders about me which he was led to accept as truths. He took it for granted that everything that came to him from Austro-Hungarian governmental sources was fact, and without examining them or any of them, he reported them to the home Government, and without any regard for the good old "audeatur et altera pars," I am informed "the incident is closed."

The Department has closed the matter. But is it closed?

As a man of peace, weary and worn out by the unequal fight, a plain, unassuming man against a powerful government, against crafty government officials trying to save themselves, I would gladly have "let the dead past bury its dead."

I will show you, however, later on, that these people's nefarious practices are still at work, right now, here in New York.

The reports sent by Mr. Storer to the State Department are deliberately false and misleading.

He, Mr. Storer, may not know this. I admit it cheerfully, though. Oh, how I wish he had taken the time and the trouble systematically to examine into them!

His recommendation would have been written in another key. He would have laid bare the infamy of certain Hungarian government officials, and would have insisted, with all the dignity and power of this Republic, that the injury done me be atoned for adequately and punitive damages be exacted from them.

With scrupulous care I will abstain from embodying into this brief aught but facts.

I will make no attempts to be eloquent, nor with pathetic appeals to arouse or attempt to arouse sympathy.

This would be—none know it better than myself—a useless and an unpardonable offense toward you, whom the American people have learned to honor and to respect as the just, fearless, and honest judge of men and character. However, I do appeal to you to look into "the case of Marcus Braun."

You must do so because you, the great jurist-statesman, can not give your tacit consent that there shall remain secretly confined in the archives of the State Department a bundle of papers—"a dossier"—which attacks the honor of an American citizen, or attempts to do so; by foul and fell innuendo casts a shadow of doubt upon the manner in which this American citizen has discharged a sworn duty; while this American citizen earnestly maintains that he can carry conviction to every fair-minded American that these attacks upon his honor are emanating from motives and sources impure and dishonest, and that the accusations against him are false as hell and known to be false to those who have had the daring to make them.

Yes, I want to show you that the accusations against me contained in that "dossier," only parts of which have been made public as a "public document of Congress," are deliberately and maliciously false. That the Government which makes them has made them in sheer despair to stop me in my work, which threatened the anyhow—from other causes—shaky Austrian and Hungarian Government with conviction of a gigantic fraud in the administration of its affairs of emigration; that that Government, which made these accusations against me, namely, that I had to be put under police surveillance; that I was looked upon with suspicion; that my past life was shady; that I had left my native country leaving unpaid debts behind me; that I had come into contact with the criminal law of the land—and what else these accusations might be—deliberately, maliciously, brutally, and cowardly told a set of falsehoods against me; and I shall never rest until you, sir, secure for me the triumphant vindication I deserve, and which I must have, unless I want to concede even the most remote possibility of there being even the barest trace of truth in these accusations.

I am fully aware of the weight of the burden I try to put upon your shoulders, but I also know your Americanism. That sublimely high sense of honor and duty which has characterized your life's work will never shirk doing what truth and justice dictate to you in this matter.

The fact that "the incident is closed" will not be a hindrance to you, because in affairs of honor and of truth and of nobility of character there are no statutes of limitation.

The fact that I am quasi rehabilitated by having been appointed to office again will not be reason for you to let bygones be bygones, because the wrong done has not been righted by reappointment.

The fact that an examination of the matter might cause embarrassment—here, there, somewhere; might even bring about the necessity of your telling a friendly foreign Government a piece of your mind and to preach to that Government a sermon upon the command of the decalogue, "Thou shalt not bear false witness"—can not be any reason for hesitancy on your part, because higher that all other considerations are the claims of an American citizen unjustly attacked in that which is dearest to him—his honor.

Nor am I afraid of the possible objection that might be raised known as "the rules of the Department," which stand in the way of a reconsideration or a rehearing of the case. I am not addressing myself to a man whom iron rules, stereotypic regulations, or bureaucratic methods could prevent from action where he thought action to be his duty.

I humbly pray, sir, not to be misunderstood. It is not pecuniary damage or public apology or something of that sort which I demand. I want your Department's thorough examination into every minute detail of the affair. I want your Department's final judgment to be issued, based on testimony and evidence, and not on scurrilous letters, "on dits," "we thinks," "anonymous communications," "we have been tolds," or "I am assureds," even if this comes from so high an officer of the Government as an ambassador to that foreign Government.

Let me now proceed, sir, and I will show you a phase in the condition of affairs in public life of Austria and Hungary the darkness of which is all the more dense for me because by it I am made to suffer for my work faithfully performed, simply to punish me for having laid bare the corrupt practices obtaining in emigration matters in that country.

Unfortunately, a representative of our own Government has allowed himself to be hoodwinked by the wily politicians of Austria and Hungary, and the ambassador at Vienna, our own Mr. Storer, was made to do for that Government—unconsciously, as I have said before—the nefarious deed of "showing me up," and to heap abuse on me and to put me into the most unenviable position imaginable, humiliating me, humbling me, and putting me on my defense.

I shall take up the report of our Mr. Storer seriatim, and I shall be satisfied to leave the result with you.

Before I do this, I must speak "in personam." The red line running through the entire affair is the accusation, by insinuation and directly made, that in 1892, when I left my native country, I did so under a cloud; that a criminal charge was pending against me; that the Hungarian Government felt justified in putting me under police surveillance.

It is incredible to suppose that people endowed with ordinary intelligence should be so awfully stupid as to find no better excuse in the attempt to justify a wrong done than this afterthought to attack my character, but yet the Budapest people do so. The awful stupidity lies in the fact of—what they should have known—my ability to refute their accusations so thoroughly and so convincingly that there remains no other conclusion to come to than that not only are the accusations made against me false and untrue, but that the people making them knew them to be so at the time they made them.

If in 1892 I left my native country under a cloud, why was I not under police surveillance when I first visited Hungary (I visited Hungary after having been in the United States only about twenty months), and why not on the occasions of my other numerous visits, and why did they appoint me to represent them in some important matter in the United States (as hereinafter specified)? Why did they grant me my discharge from the Magyar citizenship? Why did ministers of the Kingdom honor me, thanking me for services performed by me for their nation? Why did prime minister and ministers of the dual monarchy receive me officially and at private hearings? Why should I have become the target for their persecution only after I have in the honest discharge of my duty "showed them up," refused to be bribed into silence or into connivance at or participation in their doings, which I found to be contrary to the requirements of our own laws?

But pray pardon me, I will proceed chronologically. I was born in 1865, in Hungary, and in the year 1887 I was drafted into military service. I left the military service May 2, 1890, having completed the actual service and been placed in the reserve.

I immediately left Budapest and went to Munich, Bavaria, where I remained until October of the same year. From Munich I went to Paris, making stops of a few weeks at the cities of Stuttgart, Karlsruhe, and Strassburg. In Paris I remained until December, 1891, but made frequent trips from there to various parts of Europe in my capacity as a travelers' guide. My last trip as such guide I made in December, 1891, from Paris to Roumania with an Australian family, and having earned a comparatively large amount of money, I decided to emigrate to the United States. I returned to Budapest the first week of February, 1892, made application to the civil and military authorities for permission to leave, and on May 9 started on my journey, duly equipped with the necessary passport and permission entered in my military book from the proper authority. I stopped a few days in Vienna, then in Berlin, and subsequently, on June 12, sailed from Rotterdam on the S. S. Maasdam bound for New York, arriving at this port June 22, 1892. Within two or three weeks after my arrival I duly reported to the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general of New York, as prescribed by the rules and regulations, and this also was entered in my military book.

In New York I began work as a canvasser for a picture and frame concern, but already in the fall of that year I had become the reporter of the Oesterr. Ung. Zeitung, a German newspaper dedicated to the interests of the Austro-Hungarians in the United States. I also became connected with the German Herold, then, as now, one of the leading German daily newspapers of the city of New York, and with this latter newspaper I was connected as a reporter when, in April, 1893, that newspaper sent me to the Chicago World's Fair as its special representative.

In Chicago, at the World's Fair, I, in addition to my work as newspaper man, became connected with the establishment known as "Old Vienna," a semiofficial Austrian governmental exhibition or institution, being appointed as the press agent thereof.

In the course of my duty I became aware of dishonest practices on the part of the Austro-Hungarian commissioner-general, one Dr. Anton von Pallitschek, who was also consul-general of Austria and Hungary at New York City. It may not belong here to speak of this case, but it will be interesting enough to state here that, single handed and against the most powerful influences, I succeeded in forcing the Austrian Government to recall the man and to put him on trial for the malfeasance and misfeasance of office I charged him with and to secure his conviction.

I mention now another incident which shows how fully aware were the Magyar governmental authorities of my whereabouts and of my doings, so that if it had been true that when I left Hungary a criminal charge was pending against me I could have been apprehended, or if the criminal charge did not fall within the provisions of the treaty of extradition my passport could have been, as by law it should have been, refused to me.

The incident is this: On my arrival at Chicago one day—I had come and gone frequently from and to New York—I gave my handbag to Parmelee's express to carry to my hotel. In that bag there was, among other things, my passport and my military identification booklet indorsed by the Austro-Hungarian consulate. The express company lost my handbag, and I lost my papers. At my first visit to Budapest, in April, 1894, I reported my loss to the proper authorities having charge of the passport bureau and of the military affairs, and some months later I received a duplicate passport and a duplicate military identification booklet, the same being given to me by the consul-general of Austria-Hungary in New York, through whom the Hungarian authorities had forwarded it.

As stated above, in April, 1894, I visited Hungary. It was my first visit to my native land. I had become acquainted with Mr. E. P. T. Hammond, United States consul at Budapest, and he was good enough to introduce me to the then prime minister of Hungary, Mr. Alexander Wekerle.

I secured a release from participation in the military maneuvers of that year, and this permission to be absent from that service was duly entered in my military booklet. The permission to be absent during the maneuvers of the year before I had obtained that year through the Austro-Hungarian consulate.

I remained in Budapest about five or six weeks. I visited public places, men of affairs, politicians, statesmen, journalists, and newspaper offices. There was never any suggestion of my "having left under a cloud," nor of a criminal charge, nor of any charge against me. I was not molested.

In July, 1894, I was back in New York. I appeared before the naturalization bureau of the New York court of common pleas and asked to be given my "declaration of intention," known as the "first paper."

The clerk of the court wanted me to forswear my allegiance to "the Emperor of Austria." I refused, claiming that I owed no allegiance to the Emperor of Austria, but did owe allegiance to the King of Hungary, whose subject I was. The clerk refused to see any difference between an Austrian and a Hungarian subject, and I applied to the court for a mandamus.

The subject created an immense stir in Austro-Hungarian circles and journalism; it became a subject of diplomatic and parliamentary discussion, and in your Department, sir, you will find, under date of June 12, 1896, among the diplomatic and state papers, one referring in full to the "naturalization case of Marcus Braun." The Magyar newspapers lauded me for my patriotism; the Magyar ministers had their say with the Austrian minister of foreign affairs. Suffice it to say that one day the present ambassador of Austria-Hungary at Washington had me cited before him at the office of the consul-general at New York, when he, Mr. Hengelmuller, the then and present ambassador, "in behalf of the land," and "under instruction from his Government," expressed his thanks for my "patriotic conduct."

Early in 1895 I had married, the then acting consul and vice-consul of Austria and Hungary, Mr. Otto Eberhard, being one of my witnesses at the ceremony, and promptly, as required by the military laws of the country of my birth, I reported to the proper authorities this change in my "social status."

The New York Journal had just then passed into the hands of John R. McLean, and by the new management I was sent to be the special representative of that paper at the ceremonies of the opening of the Baltic Canal, at Kiel, Germany. I reported that event for the Journal and also for the Festi Naplo, at Budapest.

After the canal-opening festivities I went to Budapest with my wife, and the then prime minister of Hungary, Baron Banffy, asked me about the naturalization matter above mentioned by me, which then had not been finally decided and was still pending. I put him in possession of the facts and the manner and method of the administration of the law, gave him copies of the mandamus papers and the brief of my attorney. The minister president, Baron Banffy, took these papers to Vienna to the Austro-Hungarian foreign minister, Count Goluchowski, and the paper above mentioned, of the date of June 12, 1896, was the result of my work and of my interview with the prime minister of Hungary.

During this visit of mine at Budapest I was received by the minister president of the country, as above stated; newspapers wrote about the "Case of Marcus Braun," the "Patriotic Mr. Braun," who refuses to be known as a "subject of Austria." I was not shadowed. I was not persecuted. There was not even a suggestion of my "having left under a cloud" or of a criminal charge pending against me. I was not molested.

In the fall of 1895—I had returned to New York—Baron Johann Leonhardi, the then consul of Austria and Hungary at New York, engaged me, officially engaged me, to be the American press agent of the millennium festival that was to be held in the following year in honor and commemoration of the one thousandth anniversary of the formation of the country of my nativity.

This designation was officially recognized by the Hungarian minister of commerce. The prime minister and all the other ministers sent me their photographs with flattering letters, to be published by me in the "festival" number of "The Hungarian American," a magazine I had founded, and wherein I boomed effectually the Magyar Millennium Festival and the Budapest Exposition therewith connected.

To the "festival" I went to Budapest, taking with me also the authorization of the New York World to be its special correspondent. I was officially received by the prime minister and the other members of the cabinet, and when, on May 2, 1896, there was held at the Budapest Opera House the famous gala performance, at which even the King was present, I was made the recipient of one of the invitations sent out by the premier. Of about 800 journalists present at the capital of Hungary on that day, only six were invited to that performance, and I was, as I said, one of these six. On April 28, the present and then chief of the Budapest police, Mr. Bela Rudnay, gave me, on my personal application, a special "police-line permit." The addresses of the letters sent to me at New York by the Millennium authorities were not written or typewritten, they were printed; I was evidently on the "list," recognized as one of their own, and, later on, I was paid for my services—true, I had to sue for it. And yet, during all of that time, I was not shadowed, I was not persecuted, there was never any suggestion of criminal charges or of any charges pending against me, or that I had left my country under a cloud; I was not molested; I had an office there, with registered cable address ("Americus Budapest"), at No. 4 Nagy Korona utcza, where my shingle hung out; and in April, 1896, I was given a special police permit by the very same chief of police who in 1905 said he had to shadow me because in 1892 there was a criminal charge made against me. He had not shadowed me on my former visits, nor had he any fears of me on my subsequent visits in 1899, in 1901, and in 1902.

Do you, you the famous jurist-statesman, believe the story of that "criminal charge?"

In 1897 I applied for a discharge from the bonds of my Hungarian citizenship—to have my expatriation recognized by the Hungarian Government. This request was granted in 1897. As you may see from the attached translations of the certificates issued, the laws of Hungary absolutely forbid the expatriation of a citizen against whom any criminal charge is pending. The certification of my expatriation was issued by the mayor of the city of Budapest after the latter had received the following information from the criminal authorities, a certified copy of which was secured by United States Consul-General Frank Dyer Chester at Budapest, and which is now on file at the State Department:

ROYAL CRIMINAL COURT OF JUSTICE,
Budapest, No. 63722, 1897.

To the honorable Mayor's Office of the Capital and Residence City of Budapest, Budapest:

To your inquiry in the matter of Marcus Braun, No. 25609, and dated July 4, 1897, I have the honor to inform you with official respect that there is no criminal procedure against the individual in question under way at this court, and that no sentence has been brought which should be executed upon him.

Budapest, September 16, 1897.

Doctor SALZER, Clerk.

It was the sorry work of our own Mr. Storer, who found in the fact that I applied for this discharge in 1897 a circumstance to hit me hard, and thereby serve his Austrian friends, who evidently appealed to him to save them. Mr. Storer finds that I applied for my discharge, as he says, in 1898, because then the "statute of limitations" protected me.

Our Mr. Ambassador at the Hapsburg court is after all only a country lawyer who argues haphazardly. The Hungarian law knows no statute of limitations when the final discharge from citizenship is asked for, and, as in the United States, the statute of limitations does not run when the person wishing to avail himself thereof has voluntarily absented himself from the jurisdiction. Had he, our Mr. Storer, been of your judicial mind, had he been prompted by a desire to stand manfully and faithfully by his American compatriot, instead of trying to help the Austrian minister of foreign affairs, who, among other things, told him "he" (referring to me) "is, after all, a Jew," he could readily have seen that I made my application to be discharged from the bonds of Hungarian citizenship the first moment I had the right, under the law of Hungary, to do so, namely, in 1897. I had become a citizen of the United States in 1897. Having come to the United States in 1892, I could become a citizen of this country in 1897, and, becoming a citizen of this country in 1897, I could ask for my discharge from Hungarian citizenship only in that same year—1897—as the laws of expatriation in Hungary make it a condition sine qua non that the applicant should be able to show, by submitting his certificate of citizenship from the country of his adoption, that he has actually become a citizen of another country.

Pray forgive me for wearying you with these repetitions. The matter, however, is of supreme importance, and only his high character and his filling a position so important saves Mr. Storer from the positive charge of having acted mala fide, and to have done so intentionally, when he accused me of seeking the protection of the statute of limitations.

Mr. Storer, in his report of May 27, 1905, says that it is true that in 1898 I came back to Hungary and succeeded in obtaining a certificate of recognition of my being a citizen of the United States, and that, under the best legal advice he could obtain, the issuance of such a certificate from any provincial government of the "Austro-Hungarian Empire" only indicates that the person named owes no taxes or military service to his former government, and that there is not pending against him any legal prosecution actually begun before his emigration. Mr. Storer further reports that in my case the statute of limitations of Hungary barred before the year of my return—1898—any prosecution for acts committed before going to America, in 1890, whether they were officially recorded and published before my departure or after I left, and that on this account, there being no prosecution actually pending, certificate of United States citizenship was granted me in 1898. In order to show how superficially, carelessly, and recklessly Mr. Storer makes these statements and draws conclusions, and how ignorant the legal talent must have been from which he sought advice, I quote for your information the particular section referring to these cases of the Laws of Hungary of 1879, entitled "The obtaining and forfeiting of the rights of Hungarian citizenship:"

"SEC. 3. That he is not under criminal investigation in the territory of the laws of the Hungarian Crown; or that there was no sentence of any criminal court against him which remains unexecuted."

But, even assuming that Mr. Storer's contention is correct, do you not think that the presiding justice of the Royal Hungarian criminal court would have answered to the inquiry of the mayor of the city, "Yes; there is a criminal procedure under way against the individual in question, but the same is outlawed by the statute of limitation," provided a cause of criminal action ever existed against me? Of course he would have said so, and the law being very clear on the subject no such certificate ever would have been granted.

I now proceed.

Yes; I forgot to mention it. When, in 1896, I went to Budapest to the millennium festivities I carried with me a very flattering letter of introduction from the then consul of Austria-Hungary, Baron Johann von Leonhardi, praising me with kind partiality for my effective work in behalf of the Hungarians and the millennium in the field of American newspaperdom; a translation of this letter is also attached hereto.

As I said before, I was obliged to sue the Hungarian Government for the recovery of my salary as press agent of the millennial commission, and I then was made aware of having become in the eyes of the Hungarian Government officials "persona non grata;" though up to the time of the bringing of my lawsuit I had been "our esteemed compatriot."

I was attacked in one of their official newspapers, and there was put forward as the author of these attacks an individual by the name of Alexander Hecht, who, however, at that time went by the name of "Hajdu." This individual had lived in the early nineties and until the end of 1894 in New York under the name of "Hecht." He led an immoral life and was frequently involved in litigations which proved him to be a usurer. He was a friend of former Consul-General Von Palitschek.

I had at that time instructed Dr. Desider Olah, my attorney in Budapest, who was prosecuting my claims against the Hungarian Government, to institute proceedings for libel against the two Budapest papers, Nemzet and Magyarorszag, that had printed the libelous allegations of said Hecht-Hajdu, but owing to the fact that I was too far away from the point of litigation, and my attorney asking continually for excessive sums of money, and more particularly because of the fact that, with the aid of the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general of New York City, they attempted to and did manufacture evidence, although but of a hearsay nature, and would not even give me a chance to cross-examine the witnesses, the whole proceeding being ex parte, I did not further prosecute the matter. From the attached exhibit, which is a transcript of the testimony so concocted and manufactured, you will readily see that I could not very well afford to go into this matter more deeply, and this is also the reason why I said to Mr. Storer at Vienna and also to the consul-general at Budapest, Mr. Chester, that under no circumstances would I bring any legal proceedings for the violation of my mail and the defamation of my character, but I positively deny that I ever made this or any similar statement to any newspaper or person, as quoted by Mr. Storer.

The perusal of the testimony taken in 1897 at the Austro-Hungarian consulate of New York in that libel suit of mine is immensely interesting. That in the wide, wide world there should be a civilized country resorting to such judicial (?) methods is simply marvelous. Pray allow me to give a few outlines thereof. I had been charged with having stolen a fur coat and other things from one Horwath, in New York, and Horwath is produced. He testifies: "Braun boarded at my house; he never stole anything; there was never anything stolen at my house." Then, to counteract this, they produced Ignatius Weitner as a witness, who testifies that "somebody told him that he had heard Horwath say at one time that Braun had stolen at his house." And similar and like testimony, and even this taken ex parte, without notice to me and of course without any opportunity on my part to cross-examine.

Of course I did not prosecute the two libel suits to final end. What sane man would?

Then, in 1905, I am attacked in the most vicious manner for not having continued the prosecution of said libel cases, but this attack is again perpetrated by the same individual, "Hecht"—"Hajdu." He is made to issue a pamphlet, paid for by the Hungarian Government, and about which I have reason to believe the United States consul-general at Budapest made a special report.

Pray, look through the attached exhibits, and you will at once see how futile it would have been for me to have brought legal proceedings at Budapest.

I again visited Hungary in 1899, in 1901, and in 1902. At no time was I shadowed, at no time molested, never any suggestion made of my being a "criminal."

In 1903 I visited Austria-Hungary as an American official of the Bureau of Immigration, Department of Commerce and Labor.

I am not molested; no suggestion is made that in 1892 there was a warrant of arrest issued against me; that I left my country under a cloud; no, no, no; I am received in the most friendly spirit imaginable.

Again in 1904 I am, in official capacity, in Budapest.

Then, in 1905, I suddenly change into a suspicious person or character, and I must be shadowed, and my mail must be tampered with.

And they maintain this up to the last moment, and persuade our own Mr. Storer to believe it. These Hungarian politicians making these charges I forgive; they fought me; it was a question of political life or death to them—with brutality, true, but they fought, impelled by the law of self-preservation.

But why our ambassador at Vienna, Mr. Storer, should have lent himself to do their miserable work is something beyond by comprehension, unless it be that the smiles and the "friendship" of the Vienna nobility are nearer and dearer to his heart than the sacred rights of an American citizen.

Mr. Storer's report, and I assume full responsibility for what I say here, is a tissue of glittering generalities of things "he has been told," "he has heard," "tattle tales," unworthy of him and of the high office he holds.

Among the charges made by the Austro-Hungarian Government and echoed by Ambassador Storer against me is this: "Braun is making, through a Hungarian newspaper, propaganda for emigration to Canada."

How an American diplomatic high officer could have repeated the stupid nonsense is something you, Mr. Secretary of State, will not be able to perceive. Why, sir, if I had been guilty of the offense would the Hungarian Government have dillydallied for a second? Within an hour after that Government had learned something of the sort, having only the most remote semblance of truth, I would have been expelled from the country, as provided by the Hungarian emigration law. Of course I never did anything of the kind, neither directly nor indirectly, and I can not make any denial of the accusation broad enough, earnest enough.

Then Mr. Storer says: "Braun had himself interviewed by newspapers belonging to the opposition party, criticising the Hungarian emigration law and its administration."

I wish to state here that there is absolutely no truth in the accusation, and I defy anyone to prove anything to the contrary. There is not in all of Hungary one paper belonging to any party that contains "an authorized interview" with me, which I "had sought" or which I had not sought. Had I uttered one word of criticism against the Hungarian Government in any newspaper at any time while in Hungary in any official capacity, I could have been promptly expelled, or, if the Government desired to treat me with kid gloves, a marked copy of such newspaper, containing such indiscretion on my part, if sent to Washington, would have sufficed to have secured my prompt recall. I did, at one time, issue one signed statement which I gave "haec verba" later on, but that can not be the basis of Mr. Storer's accusation.

"Mr. Braun failed to present himself at the proper ministry with official credentials and passports, but had evidently sought to obtain notoriety as an influential personage charged with important and confidential instructions. He seemed even to seek in every direction some means of showing himself as a person obnoxious to the Hungarian Government and feared by it."

This is from Mr. Storer.

Now, as to Mr. Storer's accusation, let me say this:

In April, 1903, Mr. Storer introduced me to Doctor von Koerber, the prime minister of Austria. I had a fifteen minutes' pleasant interview with Doctor von Koerber, who sent for Councilor Franz Kaltenbrum, of the ministry of the interior. With that gentleman I had a confab of an hour and a half's duration, exclusively upon the question of emigration, the sum and substance of which interview I used in my report of 1903, and which was published in the Annual Report of the United States Commissioner-General of Immigration of that year. In February, 1905, this high official of the Austrian Government came to the United States on an official mission connected with emigration; he paid me a visit at my house, and on February 14, 1905, the same Mr. Kaltenbrum was my guest at the Hungarian dinner tendered to the President of the United States. A few days later, about the end of April, 1903, I came to Budapest, and was introduced by United States Consul Frank Dyer Chester to the Hungarian prime minister, Mr. Koloman von Szell. The prime minister referred me to Councilor Dr. Alexander Selley, of the ministry of the interior, who is in charge of all matters relating to emigration and police. This interview and a number of others, and documents, prints, circulars which I received from him personally I also refer to, and do so pretty fully in my report of 1903, and yet I am accused of having "failed to present myself at the proper ministry with official credentials and passports."

Did not he (Mr. Storer) introduce me? Did not Mr. Chester introduce me? Did I not call again on the same officials in 1904? Upon my arrival, in April, 1905, Mr. Chester gave me a special Hungarian letter of introduction, hereto attached, which I used while traveling through the country. Why should I have gone to this high official every time I came to Vienna and Budapest? Was I a diplomat or consular officer, or was I simply a plain immigration inspector, an expert, sent out by his Government to observe certain things and to report his observations?

And yet there is the ex parte accusation of "Mr. Braun failing to present himself at the proper ministry with official credentials."

Shall I waste your time, honored sir, in attempting to refute such general charges, that I "evidently sought to obtain notoriety," or I "seemed to seek some means of having myself known as a person obnoxious to the Hungarian Government or feared by it?"

I sought notoriety? No; a thousand times no! I had become notorious enough in the eyes of the Hungarian Government when my report of 1904 had become known to the Government, and the interesting part of the story is that the Hungarian Government knew the contents of my report of 1904 long before the American public learned it. Knew it through what sources? Who knows? But know it they did, as I have full reason to assert, and from their minute, and, to me incomprehensible, knowledge of my work grew the strong feeling of antipathy that manifested itself against me and eventually was intensified by my speech at the Presidential dinner of February 14, 1905.

In my report for the year 1904 I had set forth the truth as I saw it, the truth as it is or then was. I put my finger on the ulcerous sores. I showed how they failed to bribe me, and I showed how willing they were to escape responsibility by simply denying statements, made within one month, denying them with the boldness and audacity of professional liars. Of course I knew then they feared me, just the same as the burglar fears the policeman, but I never did anything, said anything, which would justify Mr. Storer of accusing me that I sought the opportunities to show how they feared me.

I say I knew they feared me. Did not I, until then an unheard-of individual, have the courage to unmask an Austro-Hungarian consul-general as a cheat and help him to be convicted of crime? Did I not, to a certain extent, break up the supererogation of the office of the consuls-general of New York to guide the social and political life of the Hungarians in New York and force them back into their own official spheres?

Did not I unmask the hypocrisy of an Austro-Hungarian consul-general of New York, who, very properly, half-masted the consulate's flag on the receipt of the sad news of the assassination of his Empress Queen, and who proclaimed the usual official mourning for her, and then went to an opera bouffe and leg show performance?

Did not I unmask one of the consular secretaries as being a common gambler, arrested in a raid in a low dive, hauled in a patrol wagon to one of the police courts of New York City? Did not I compel the Austro-Hungarian ambassador at Washington to admit that one of his subordinates who was sent by him to investigate certain conditions of Hungarian miners in West Virginia was a common forger?

Did not I have in mind my experience with the officials of the Government when I had to sue for my earnings as the press agent for the work performed in New York at the time of the millennial?

Had I forgotten my experiences with their administration of justice when I had brought my libel suit against "Nemzet" and "Magyarorszag?"

Of course, I knew I was not persona grata with these people, just as I am surely persona non grata with crooked steamship agents, fake bankers, and individuals of this stamp and this class.

Had I been the most fastidious claimant to forms of etiquette and propriety I could not have complained of my reception in Hungary in 1903 or in 1904.

It was all different in 1905. Then, in 1905, my report was known in Hungary, and I was in the eyes of these people the "black sheep" of the nation, the "foul bird who had soiled his own nest."

Long before I had come to Budapest I was pictured as a traitor. One of the Hungarian papers wrote: "We prefer to shake hands with any of our men who work in the coal mines of Pennsylvania and come back home as good Hungarians than with any of these Americanized Hungarians who dine the President of the United States."

These articles and their English translations I forwarded at that time to the Commissioner-General of Immigration at Washington, and had Mr. Storer paid a little attention to the newspapers of Austria-Hungary he could have readily seen and known how "notorious" I was long before my arrival.

I never added to this "notoriety," nor did I ever attempt, directly or indirectly, to add thereto by an interview, or criticism, remarks, statements, or information of any sort. If I gave any "information," I did so—as it was my right and sworn duty to do—about our immigration laws, and then only in response to requests made to me in good faith, and I repeat it here only as to what our laws were upon this or the other subject.

If I knew anything, I knew the people of Hungary; I knew the state of feeling of the Government; I knew the very air of the land, or, at least, of Government circles, to be pregnant with the feeling of hatred toward me. I knew I must be full of tact, of discretion, of caution, of serene, calm, philosophy, and, above all, I knew I must be absolutely truthful, so as not to give even the semblance of an outcry against me. And what I knew I had to be, I lived up to to the very dot on the "i."

I might be permitted to say here that this "tact" and "discretion" and "caution" were not unnatural to me to preserve. I do not wish to boast, but I wish to point out how I had made trips of more than 200,000 miles for the Bureau of Immigration; had visited England, France, Italy, Germany, Russia, the Turkish and the Balkan provinces, Egypt, Palestine, Cuba, Mexico, and so forth—everywhere on the same or similar mission as sent to Hungary. From nowhere ever came even the hint of an "indiscreet conduct" or "want of tact" or "notoriety seeking" or any charge whatever, although in none of the places was I welcome, because everywhere it was known that I had come to learn of any possible transgressions against our immigration laws, and there are such transgressors in many other countries.

No; a thousand times no. I sought no notoriety; I was not boastful; I was not indiscreet; I was not guilty of want of tact.

Then came the incident of my catching, red-handed, the detective pilfering my mail.

And then came the miserable denials, the prevarications, the lies, the slanders.

I dare to say it, without fear of successful contradiction, that never yet has a more cowardly, miserable trick been played upon an American ambassador or any ambassador of any land than has been played by Minister Count Goluchowsky upon our Mr. Storer, when the Austrian diplomat showed to him the warrant printed on page 10 of House Document No. 482, which warrant of arrest Mr. Storer says induced him not to insist "to obtain from the Hungarian Government an absolute retraction of the statement, as well as a denial of its official character."

I learned of the existence of this document only recently.

Never, absolutely never, had it been mentioned while I was in Budapest.

When I caught the detective he at first denied that he had touched my mail or that he had anything to do with me or my affairs; he claimed even not to know my name.

Then he issued a statement, of which I attach a translation, of having watched me because he had learned that in Munich and in New York I had been guilty of larcenies and defalcations.

The newspaper discussion about this case lasted over a week. There was never in any of the papers a statement that I had figured at any time in the "official police journal," or that a police circular or warrant had ever been issued against me.

When that dectective and his chief and the Government organs pounded me most viciously the "warrant" or "police circular" was not mentioned or even hinted at.

As I said before, and I say it here with the solemnity of an oath, I learn of it now, through Mr. Storer's letter to Mr. Hay, dated May 23, 1905, and printed in House Document No. 482.

Mr. Storer, whom I saw the last time on May 26, 1905, never mentioned that warrant to me; he did not even hint at the existence of such a charge.

According to the police record a warrant was issued against one Marcus Braun; it was issued December 16, 1891, and published in the Police Journal February 1, 1892.

Shall I solemnly deny of being the man named and described in that warrant of arrest?

Yes! I most solemnly deny it! If, indeed, there ever had been such a warrant issued; if it was not convenient to manufacture it for the purpose for which it had been actually used, namely, to hoodwink Mr. Storer, and, through him, our home Government!

A warrant issued against me on December 16, 1891, and published in the official Police Journal, the publication in the hands of every police officer in the dual monarchy, and in all head offices of all police departments throughout Europe, on February 1, 1892, and—just think of it—my passport is dated April, 1892, my official military identification booklet containing permission to leave for America, is dated also April, 1892, and bears the signatures of the military authorities for May 20, 1894, November 11, 1894, December 20, 1895, July 1, 1896, August 19, 1896, and September 17, 1896, entered on the occasion of my various visits to Hungary.

My discharge from the bonds of Magyar citizenship bears date December 6, 1897. Early in 1899 the ministry of national defense sent me, through the New York consulate, a medal.

I visited Budapest in 1894, and again, and again, and again I visited Budapest. At one time I sued the very Government, and the Government settled with me; at one time the chief of police favors me by giving me a special police line permit.

Never is it claimed, hinted at, or suggested that such a warrant had ever been issued; it is not brought forward as a defense when the matter is in court; when, look and behold, it is shown by Count Goluckowsky to Ambassador Storer, and he, believing it to be a bona fide warrant once issued against me, thereupon comes to the conclusion that my past life in Hungary was not blameless, changes his position, and allows the Hungarian Government to escape liability upon the giving of a colorless declaration, a meaningless declaration of not being responsible for what some overofficious subordinate officer has done; whereas there are documents in possession of the State Department showing just the reverse of this assertion.

But, even assuming that such a notice was ever inserted in the Police Journal, does that mean that the person mentioned is guilty of crime? Has Mr. Storer not acquainted himself as yet with the "honest workings" of the Budapest police, notorious all over the world, with a record which makes the deeds of the Tweed régime of New York look like the acts of angels? Let Mr. Storer make inquiries and he will find out that for 5 florins he can get anybody's name into the Police Journal.

Now let me show you that this very avowal of not being responsible for what a subordinate official has done is a cowardly, miserable falsehood and subterfuge.

That not the subordinate did it—what had been done—but that he was the authorized agent of the Government, acting under positive instructions; that the Government of Hungary did it—did it deliberately and did it maliciously.

"The incident is closed," I am informed by the Third Assistant Secretary of State in answer to my inquiry, upon my return from Europe. I am not allowed to go to Washington to present my case, and I am ordered to report for duty at Ellis Island. There by whispers and occasional hints I learn some of the contents of the secret charges filed against me with the State Department. Among the Hungarian residents of New York it is openly discussed how "Braun's record was shown up," and "what a great diplomatic victory Austria-Hungary has won over the United States." I am being ostracized, snubbed, and the anyhow intrigue-ridden officials and superiors of mine in some of the principal ports of entry of the United States, some of whom maintain at all times very close relations with Austro-Hungarian consulates, plainly let me feel their contempt for me.

I appeal to Washington for relief and information; nothing is forthcoming. Under the date of July 13, 1905, I appealed to the President. Please, Mr. Secretary of State, read the attached copy of that letter to the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and then judge for yourself whether the documents referring to my case and shelved in the archives of your Department, jealously guarded as state secrets, were really secrets, or whether or not their contents were known to many people, and naturally were also made known to me through channels close to the Austro-Hungarian consul-general of this city.

Then when the situation becomes simply unbearable, when I am daily flooded with anonymous letters and postal cards, when the residents of the Hungarian quarter of New York get in such a pit of excitement by continuous controversies pro and contra Braun in almost every public coffeehouse, and when these controversies eventually culminate in fistic fights and terminate in police courts, I finally decide to resign my position, and state, as I did state to the Commissioner-General of Immigration in an interview held August 12, 1905, at Ellis Island, that my resignation is due to the picayune, pettifogging behavior of some of my colleagues and superiors, which, however, is only a contributing cause, and that the main reason is, as I stated, "I do not think I can afford to serve any further a Government which can not protect its officers from insults and indignities."

But I will show still more.

I will show, as I have heretofore indicated, that the Hungarian Government still is persecuting me, or at least lending its hand to malicious "busybodies" among the Hungarians of New York.

According to the report of our Mr. Storer, the Hungarian Government disavowed the action of that subordinate official, gave him a reprimand, and Mr. Storer allowed himself to be persuaded that the Hungarian Government had done all that it ought and he could justly demand.

When I had caught Detective Kalmar tampering with my mail, and when he had me cited before the police magistrate for having insulted and having threatened him with bodily harm, the position by him taken was an absolute denial.

He never mentioned that he had watched me; he never mentioned having had any suspicions against me.

I, however, knew—I did not have a suspicion that my mail was being read by the police before I received it, I knew this to be the case. I positively knew it. I reported, not a suspicion, but the positive accusation of this being done. I did so to the consul-general at Budapest, to Mr. Storer at Vienna, and to the Commissioner-General of Immigration at Washington, and I believe there must be a report to this effect in the archives of your Department from Consul-General Chester.

I knew, for instance, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon the contents of my letters that reached me only at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, because they were read at police headquarters before 11 a. m., and I was told of it, and the sum and substance of the letters were given to me under the seal of secrecy by one of the officials reading them—and reading them at the command of the chief of the bureau. This official of the bureau, who read my letters, and several others of his colleagues being told by the chief to read my correspondence because the chief had said to his subordinates it was necessary to catch me red-handed in my business of dealing in white slaves—exporting girls to the United States for immoral purposes—that the year before I had taken out sixty-eight girls.

Of course I said to Mr. Storer that I can not very well give the name of my informant, but did not the United States consul-general at Budapest offer to depose under oath his knowledge hereof, by him ascertained?

This tender of his deposition by the consul-general of the United States at Budapest ought to be, I think, on file in your Department.

I believe there should be among these papers a report, or a letter written by my Budapest attorney to Mr. Storer, relating what he knows upon this subject. He and I, coming out of a theater, were met by a high police official—one of the superiors of Detective Kalmar—who accosted me with the question, "When are you going to Detta?" Now, the possibility of my going to Detta, an out-of-the-way place, insignificant and unimportant—as if, for instance, a New Yorker would be asked, "When are you going to—not to Long Branch, or Newport, or Lakewood, or Washington—but to Flushing, Long Island?"—was hinted at in a family letter received a few hours before, but which letter had—the conclusion is absolutely irresistible—before its delivery to me been read by that police official.

But to return to my story. When Kalmar, the detective, had made his complaint, and had said that he knew nothing of me, had nothing to do with me, or with my mail, and that he did not even know my name, and after I had been fined, the United States consul-general went to Kalmar's chiefs. I had been there with Mr. Chester before the trial. Then, and only then, came a change in their position. Then it was admitted that I had been watched, "because it was a necessity," and finally even the reading of my mail was admitted, not in so many words, but by the evasive answers and the claim of "whatever we did, we had a right to do, because Braun was a suspicious character," etc.

The perusal of all the documents in the State Department ought to show this with absolute clearness. The claim of the Budapest police authorities that Detective Kalmar did not act under their positive orders is a most cowardly shirking of their responsibility, is a deliberate falsehood.

Then they say that Kalmar had been reprimanded for his superofficiousness and unauthorized action.

Let us see. Was he really reprimanded?

The incident was officially "closed" in May, 1905. In the exhibits hereto annexed there are two copies of letters written by this same Detective Kalmar, the first dated June 16, 1905, and addressed to the editor of a Hungarian newspaper in New York, wherein this man Kalmar requests the editor to print in that Hungarian newspaper, published here in New York, a long line of accusations and charges against me—bitter, vituperative slanders—and adds that if the Hungarian paper be not willing to publish that letter, how he will have it translated into English, and then have it printed in the English newspapers of the United States.

The second letter is dated September 25, 1905, and is of a similar nature, and mentions publishing the story in the form of a pamphlet which he, Kalmar, will send to the President.

Of course, it is possible to presume that these letters were written by that detective, whose action was disavowed by the Government of Hungary, and who had been reprimanded (?) for it by the same Government, on his sole responsibility, and that the Hungarian Government, or, at least, his superiors, knew nothing of it; but it is a pretty violent presumption. Much more reasonable is my claim "that the incident is not closed," not closed, at least, by the Hungarian Government circles.

Fuel is added to this more reasonable claim of mine by a pamphlet published and widely circulated here in New York and other cities by one Lajos Steiner, a copy of which I also attach herewith as an exhibit. Of course, it is again possible that Lajos Steiner published that pamphlet on his own responsibility. This, too, however, is a very violent presumption.

Mr. Lajos Steiner is not that kind of a man. We know him here in New York. We know him to be an irresponsible nondescript "agent," with an office in his hat, and we know his record and reputation from all over the United States where Hungarians reside. He is one of the "professional patriots" old Hungary unloaded on the young Republic. He has, or had, the backing of the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general of New York. Personally I know nothing about it, but I know of his repeated boasts to the acting in the Braun matter, for and in behalf of that consulate, and it is pretty well known that he has regular or irregular office hours at that consulate, or where he at least hangs out. A little over a year ago he went to Hungary with letters of recommendation from the Austro-Hungarian embassy at Washington, and the consulate-general of this city, which letters he (Steiner) freely showed prior to his departure, and in which letters he was mentioned as being the proper man for the organization of that "famous" Hungarian National Bank in America, which bank is destined, according to the views of Hungarian Government officials, to quadruple the flow of dollars from Hungarian immigrants in the United States to the country of their nativity.

In a criminal libel suit which I have instituted against Steiner he is being defended by the former law partner of Ignatius Weltner, deceased, who, when in the land of the living, was the attorney of the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general of New York, and who, as you may see from the annexed exhibits, was the man who concocted and manufactured in the office of that very consulate evidence against me, and which was used in the two libel suits instituted against two Budapest newspapers in 1896. Weitner was the man who, in May, 1899, made the same libelous charges as the Hungarian Government and the Budapest police did against me to President Roosevelt, the then governor of this State, and who did dismiss them as base slanders.

Of course, the fact that Weitner's law partner defends now Steiner may also be only a mere coincidence, but how kind must have been Divine Providence to my accusers to bring these happy chances about.

Pray permit me once more to return to the charges made against me, that articles appeared in Hungarian newspapers, "apparently on my authority," or that I had inspired certain newspaper stories in this emigration matter. The Hungarian Government produces no evidence to substantiate this charge, and I solemnly state under the sanctity of my oath that it is untrue. I am no more responsible for those newspaper articles than I am for the tide that ebbs and flows.

I saw some of these articles after they had been in print, and, pray, what could I do? Protest against the use of my name if I found my name of them? Of course I could not do it. "The other side" would have greeted that as the very chance by them sought—i. e., to engage in a discussion, a controversy, a newspaper fight. Take that article mentioned in Mr. Storer's report, on page 11 of House Document No. 482—the article in the Magyarorszag. I knew as little of its publication, despite Mr. Storer's gratuitous assertion of that article being "published by the apparent authority of Mr. Braun," as did Mr. Storer, and surely he knew nothing of it. If I wanted to have an article published or wanted to suggest the publication of one, I would not go to that newspaper—Magyarorszag. I could not go to that newspaper. This was the very newspaper which I sued for libel in 1896, and in which libel suit the "evidence" spoken of was collected by that publication, and was then being hurled at me by Detective Kalmara and his superiors.

Again and again I deny that I ever had any interviews, that I ever talked for publication with any newspaper man. True, I was besieged by them day after day, but I resisted their importuning, persuasion, promise, prayer; I kept aloof from them. If I ever did receive any newspaper man, it was only at a time while I had somebody whom I could absolutely trust with me.

Mr. Storer, in his letter of May 27 to Mr. Hay, reports that the minister of foreign affairs, Count Goluchowsky, had told him that he had definite complaint laid before him by the Hungarian Government that Mr. Braun was either in the employ of or was intimately connected with a well-known Jewish emigration house in Bremen—Meslar & Co.

That the Hungarian Government had the physical ability to make such a complaint is possible, but that it had any direct or indirect, distinct or faint, close or remote, just or seemingly just, true or seemingly true, probable or possible grounds for making this accusation, or evidence on which to make it, is as atrocious a slander as if it had said that he (Mr. Storer) is the "company" of that firm.

I think the "Meslar & Co." in Mr. Storer's letter is identical with the firm of Missler & Co., and how "intimately connected" I was with that firm is visible from my reports on file in the Department of Commerce and Labor, published with the annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration, and also published in House Document No. 384, brought forth by resolution of Congress adopted January 6, 1906. If these reports of mine do not refute and repel this silly charge, then my most solemn oath can not do it. By the way, it is, en passant, worth while to state that the firm named is not a Jewish emigration house; the members thereof are coreligionists of Count Goluchowsky and of Count Tisza, and are not coreligionists of mine.

One thing more. You, sir, might reply to me: "I can not hear an appeal from any decision of my famous predecessor in office." Your predecessor in office has had just time and strength enough to affix his signature to what his subordinate, Mr. Loomis, had reported to him, a synopsis of what he had found in the letters of Mr. Storer. Neither Mr. Hay nor Mr. Loomis had, however, the facts before them as you have them now. This is not an appeal from the decision of the late Secretary Hay. This is a case submitted to you, not "on newly discovered evidence," but on statements of fact never presented to the late lamented Mr. Hay nor ever brought to your attention.

Sir, the closing days of the last and the opening days of this century had their Dreyfus case with its famous secret dossier. Well, thank God, the Republic, which never knew kingcraft or priestcraft, has no need of secret dossiers. Our nation, as a nation, worships that holiest of trinities, law, labor, and liberty, and the foundation stones on which it is built are justice and equality.

Justice and equality to all, even to the Jew. For there is Count Goluchowsky's sorest wound, "that he was a Jew, and that I might know the friction inevitably to be anticipated on that account," reports Mr. Storer.

Yes; I am a Jew. Mr. Storer might have replied to Count Goluchowsky: "No; we in the United States might not have known of any friction arising by reason of one of our officials being a Jew. Why should friction arise from that?"

Mr. Storer seemed to concede the point, and thereby missed a chance to give to a proud empire-kingdom a lesson in religious tolerance which might have had a blissful influence on all humanity.

But that is neither here nor there. I am a Jew, but I am an American citizen of my own free will and choice.

In the name of the elementary laws of our land I demand at your hands my vindication or my condemnation.

The immortal soul of your immediate predecessor will approvingly and contentedly look down on your brave deed of reexamining the case, to which he could give, if at all, but a passing attention.

In spite of my burning desire to be brief, I see my "brief" to have grown to unusual length. I have, however, no apology to offer, except to point out to you the supreme importance of the issues involved. To me naught beneath the sky is of more importance than my good name.

When the statesman warrior at the helm of our ship of state honored me with an appointment, I felt the responsibility. I enthusiastically undertook to prove to my American home, to my superiors, from the Commissioner-General of Immigration up to the President of the Republic, and, still higher up, to the people of the United States, that the naturalized citizen of Hungarian birth is with all his heart and soul, with every throb of his blood and every thought of his brain, a good American, guided by the highest sense of honor and duty, worthy of the confidence of his fellow-Americans.

I implore you to set me right before the American people; I beg of you to study the annexed exhibits, and I respectfully request, as an American citizen, that you put a stop to the interference of foreign government officials with their former countrymen in this country. Kindly consider that for ten long years I have been and am being hounded. Why? For what reasons? Just because I am an American, and because I do not believe in the "modern" doctrine of certain foreign governments to always remain loyal to the country of my nativity, even at the expense of my Americanism. I implore you to take into consideration that, after all, as a citizen it is my sacred right to demand from your Department protection against the interference of foreign governments with my constitutional rights and not be compelled to waste my time and money—until now over $6,000—to fight for my unjustly attacked honor, to defend myself against mean, contemptible, and underhanded conspiracies and slanders.

But above all you have to set me right before the American people.

This "me" is not only the person of Marcus Braun, it is the principle which he represents; faith and confidence in the patriotism of the naturalized citizen, and in his gratitude to the nation which received him, elevated him to the proud position of being its citizen, and which nation had honored him with an appointment to an office of trust and honor.

I submit my appeal to you, sir, with full confidence in your high sense of justice.

Yours, most respectfully,

MARCUS BRAUN,
78 Second avenue, New York City.

[Letter No. 2.]

VERY MUCH HONORED MR. EDITOR: Under instruction of His Excellency Alexander Erdely, minister of justice, I have pleasure to reply to your favor of February 12, and to inclose herewith his photograph.

Simultaneously I give herewith, in a few lines, his biography.

Alexander Erdely, born 1839, became after he was admitted to the bar a clerk of the county of Pest; was later advanced to deputy county clerk and later on as chief clerk of the county. On July 19, 1870, he became clerk of the superior court, and in 1871 he was permitted to be judge of the royal civil court of Pest. He became supreme court judge in 1875, and in 1886 was called to the highest tribunal of the land as a judge. He was transferred in 1891 as president of the royal court at Gyor.

The that time minister of justice, Desidariu Szilagyi, recognized his manifold abilities, appointed him as state secretary of his ministry on August 8, 1892.

After the withdrawal of the Wekerle Cabinet on January 15, 1895, the King appointed him minister of justice.

During the time that he was state secretary of the ministry of justice, he was a true collaborator of the Minister Szilagyi, and labored unceasingly for the Hungarian legal reforms.

During his tenure of office of minister of justice, the most important law that was enacted is the obligatory civil-marriage law and the changes in the inheritance law.

He also drafted a new criminal and civil procedure, which will be brought before the House of Parliament at one of its next sessions. He set for himself a very lasting monument by bringing about the appointment of the commission to codify the Hungarian privy rights.

In expressing his excellency's most sincere thanks for your kindness, and acknowledging the receipt of your beautiful magazine, I have the honor to remain,

Your obedient servant, GYULANYI LAJOS,
Councilor of the Minister of Justice.

Should fate guide you once more among us, we shall be glad to renew our friendship, not only the eight of us, who know you since 1890, but all of our members, who know your merits by the resolution of thanks embodied in the minutes of our proceedings in 1890; we should be all glad to count you among our members.

It is but natural that we should gladly comply with your request, and we state with pleasure that we count you among our good and pleasantly remembered members, that to our knowledge you owe nothing to either the relief association or to any individual member thereof. To this we will always cheerfully and in any form testify, and we only hope that you will neither in the present nor in the future be in need of such testimonial, since it is we who are your debtors on account of your merits in behalf of our association.

We close this letter, written in the name of the Hungarian Relief Association of Munich, hoping that you will honor us with a visit whenever you should happen to pass this way. With patriotic regards,

In the name of His Majesty the King, the royal criminal court of Budapest, as a trial court in libel matters, has, on the day date below written and in the matter of the libel suit brought by Marcus Braun, as private complainant and represented by Dr. Desiderius Olah, attorney, Budapest, against Victor Halasi, represented by William Varsonyi, attorney, Budapest, brought the following

DECISION.

The royal press juridical court herewith discontinues, based upon sections 268, 110, and 116 of the criminal code, the criminal libel suit presented by Marcus Braun, private complainant, under No. 76262/96, in which complaint of his he, based on section 258 of the criminal code relating to slander and of section 261 relating to defamation of character, had sued for redress; and of this decision he and the attorney for the defense, Victor Halasi, are forthwith to be notified.

ASSIGNMENT OF REASONS.

In the daily newspaper Magyarorszag, dated 1896, July 4, No. 183, there was contained under the heading "Daily news" a notice, designated "Marcus Braun," the contents of which, it was complained, were according to section 258 of the criminal code libelous, and according to section 261 defamatory, and for which a private complaint was lodged on November 28, 1896, under No. 76263/96, against Victor Halasi, and to which complaint on November 6, 1897, under No. 74643/97 of the criminal court records, and to the private complainant delivered on November, 1897, a decision calling upon him to present the judicial bill of complaint and his interrogatories, what to do however he had failed. Therefore, acording to a proscription of the ministry of justice dated 1867, October 1, and No. 733, subdivision 5, the complaint must be considered to have been withdrawn and the further proceeding herein is, according to sections 110 and 116, ended.

Braun–Nemzet. 53756/96. Libel suit of Marcus Braun against Nemzet. Verbal proceeding. Decision received 96⁸/X Mr. Fischer (ordering an investigation). Decision. 62957/96. Gapári names Alexander Hecht as the writer of the article.

Minutes of examination: Alexander Hecht acknowledges to be the author of the article. Demands that the doings of B. in America be examined through the consulate. He has been informed that at this time B. is under criminal charges and that the Hungarian Society has expelled him for being guilty of blackmail. He desires to prove that B. has absconded from Munich with the proceeds of an entertainment of the "Ungar Verein," and that he has misappropriated moneys of Banker Policzer.

Continued 20/III 97. Demands the examination of Dr. Gerster for B's exclusion from the New York Hungarian Society on account of larceny; the furrier, Géza Horvath, from whom he had stolen fur goods and a gold watch and chain; Julius Firemann, a reporter and the draftsman of the World, to prove that B had claimed here to be the representative of the W.; Charles Takács, from whom he attempted to borrow ten dollars, and because he did not get it he attacked him in divers blackmailing newspapers; Peter Vay, an inhabitant of N. Y., whom he wrote up because he could not get from him two dollars; Ignatius Weltner, whether it be true that he, B, had stolen 70 mark from the society in Munich, or from the president, Mr. Zochor, a gold watch, and how he ran away from there, or the original of the letter containing these facts; demands further the exam. of Philip Freund, Fr. Bossányl, and Stephen Dobó, why had he been excluded from the Hung. Society; Max Schwartz, banker, about the larceny of 70 mark and a gold watch; Louis Ujzab, to whom B went with the complaint that the members of the Hung. Soc. had torn down the picture of the King of Hungary; Anton Pallicock, the former chief comm'r of Austria at the Chicago Fair, how B had been committing divers blackmailing operations; Stephen Dobó, about his report to Baron Feběrváry (deserter from army); demands the exam. of Herman Böhm, what deceits and cheats B had practiced at the Chicago Fair, and for this same purpose demands the examination of Ettiene von Scanavi.

Examination of witnesses, taken 25/11,'97. The witness Zochor, watchmaker, to the merits. The Hungarian Society had arranged in October '89 or '90 a Vintage festival. I do not know any more where the necessary printing matter had been printed, they did cost about 60 marks, although an agent of the printer's office, a certain Levinger, had said the money is presented to us. A few days later, nevertheless, there came to us from the printing office a bill for 70 mark for these printed matters. We left back in the hands of Mr. Braun 70 marks to pay this printing bill. All at once I heard Mr. Braun not to be any longer in Munich, and not very long after the society received from the printer another bill; this one, however, we did not pay. Early in '96 or the last of '95 I received from Braun from America the 70 mark and a letter, later another small sum which he owed me. Who is the Politzer named in the requisitions of the 5th of this month or where he resides is unknown to me.

Taking of testimony 13/III, '97. The witness Politzer. Neither I nor any of my two brothers living here are bankers, we do not know M. B. nor do we know who the banker Polizer might be. About 17 years ago I knew here a lottery agent B., but he did not injure me or my brothers.

The examining judge sets aside the decision to gather proofs as to the charge of military desertion, because they are not connected with the pending matter.

The response of the consulate at Zurich: Mr. B. is, from the time of my official work at Chicago, as a man of bad repute in my memory, who attempted to use his position as a journalist to levy blackmail, but I know nothing personally nor any details, inasmuch as all these informations were received by me mostly from Mr. Ettiene von Scanavi.

Minutes taken at the I. and R. consulate-general at New York 26/VI 97.

1. Geza Horvath: He resided in my house, but never committed any crime. There was no larceny committed at my house.

2. Dr. Bossanyi: To my knowledge, M. B. was expelled from the Hung. Society for the reason because the response of the Munich Hung. Society, in response to the inquiry of the N. Y. Society as to B.'s individuality, had not been favorable to him. He, the witness, has heard from others that B. had misused his position as a journalist and has squeezed money out of people, as from Mr. Carl Poringer.

3. Weltner (Ignatius): The facts stated in the questioning statements of the examining magistracy at Budapest are true in full. He attaches the letter of the Munich Society and the minutes of the New York Hung. Society. (See below the translation of these extr. of the minutes.) At that time he, witness, was the president of the society. B. attacked the society, without any cause, in the German papers of New York and the police newspapers of Budapest. B. showed, in Oct., 96, the letter of the president of the Munich Society, which he refers to as his vindication, but in that letter the fact of misappropriation and of theft are not rebutted. I wish to state that Horvath has told me in presence of many people that B. had stolen from him fur goods and from his wife a watch and chain, and that the fur goods were found by Horvath in B.'s possession, who admitted the theft and made the loss good.

I. (Translation of the Munich letter.) Munich, 96, 23/III. M. B., journeyman tinsmith, formerly member, ran away with 70 marks. Besides this he has caused losses to others; from me he took a watch which he forgot to return; there are such who have been injured by him to 100 marks even. From here he went to Paris, whence similar news came, etc., etc. Desiderious Zochor, Pres.

II. The minutes contained in the letter of the examining magistrate, and which is the basis of the article in the Nemzet, and which has been sent to me is a true copy of those minutes.

STOCKINGER, Consul-Gen'l.

Stephen Dobó, member of the Hung. Society, testified:

B. has been excluded from the Hung. Society by reason of the information received from Munich and other places, because his character did not respond to the requirements of the statutes and laws; furthermore B. had attacked in German blackmailing journals the patriotic efforts and aims of the society, and had abused the members of the society and the participants at the society's festivals and ridiculed the program simply because he did not receive the advertisements, and the society, not to aid such as he, would not give it to him. He had heard from Furrier Horvath, in the presence of John Marko and Samuel Weiss, that B. had stolen his H.'s fur coat and watch, and Horvath declared of being amazed that B. leads a leading rôle among the Hungarians of New York; when witness D. demanded from Horvath a written statement of B.'s doings, H. refused, stating that he has been settled with fully and that B. even helped him when he was out of work.

Vay Peter: The matter does not stand entirely thus. I stood in good relationship with B. until I had a disagreeable private affair which B. published in a garbled form in a local paper. Before publishing this story B. had called repeatedly at my house, but did not find me. After the publication I held B. responsible and B. responded, "I was repeatedly at your house to see you; I could not find you; you did not pay, and I reported the case." When I told this story in a society it caused no astonishment. I was told he had done this to others, and I was told that he had robbed Horvath.

Marcus Schnitzer knows of the larceny of B. only so much that at one time the president of the Hung. Society had shown him a letter from the pres. of the Munich Hung. Society wherein B. had been charged with larceny and misappropriation.

Dr. Arpád Gerster, the honorary pres. of the Hung. Society, had never any knowledge of the matters and can give no information whatever concerning it.

Minutes taken 99 15/IV at the Hungarian Society meeting: Ed. Wurmfold calls the attention of the society to the fact that B. attacks the good name of the society and demands his expulsion.

Minutes taken at same place 22/IV 96. Inasmuch Bertalan Nagy. E. W. and Simon Steindler positively know that B. is bent to injure our society and has libeled the society in German and Hungarian newspapers, he has been expelled by a vote of seven majority. Braun-Magyarország. Libel suit of M. B. against Mogyss and Holló.

Minutes 6/XI 96. Victor Halaszi is the author of the article. The information published was taken from the Nemzet. Assumes responsibility only as a copyist or reporter. Does not know B. and therefore could not have charged him with the matter. Ladiszlaus Inczedi, ass't editor, has called his attention to the article. The manuscript of the article he recognized as his handwriting.

Decision upon complaint 12/11 97, was amicably compromised.

AN UNVEILED GOVERNMENT COMMISSION.

The press bureau of the police department publishes the following as the declaration of Detective Hugo Kalmar:

The notices in some of the daily newspapers concerning myself, namely, to have opened the letters of Marcus Braun and have followed him on his voyage to Vienna, are slanderous from beginning to end. It is true that I, who have resided in the Hotel Hungaria since many a year, know Marcus Braun, who arrived in the month of April with one Edward Loffler—a man who has been sought for by the police for fraudulent bankruptcy—and who has taken apartments at the hotel hereinbefore mentioned; know him as a dangerous swindler, who misused his acquaintances in America and his connections to blackmail them, and who is living there by swindle and fraud. I began to interest myself, therefore, in Braun, and in accordance with my duty I followed with interest his life here, the grounds of his being here, and watched his connections in this city, which, I admit, might have been to him, who has reasons to cover up his deeds before the police authorities, disagreeable, and must have imbued him to spread lying reports. As to the individual and as to the questions as to who Marcus Braun is, let there be reprinted here a letter of the Hungarian Aid Society of Munich, dated March 23, 1896, in response to a letter of the presidency of the New York Hungarian Society, making inquiries about Marcus Braun:

DEAR COMPATRIOTS: In response to your respected lines of the 11th instant I have the pleasure to inform you that Marcus Braun, journeyman tinsmith, of Budapest, was in 1890 a member of our society, and toward the end of October, 1890, he ran away with 70 marks of our society's money. Besides these 70 marks, he injured seriously many other Hungarians. He had forgotten to give me back a watch which he had borrowed, and there are such persons whom he injured to the tune of hundreds of marks. The honorable presidency would oblige me very much if you were to hand him the inclosed list of names; perhaps he might make good the sums he had stolen from the society. From Munich he went to Paris, whence at that time similar news had gone about him, from which I could not gain the thought of his having commenced to lead a new life. In Munich he played the rôle as his interests required, as tinsmith, as a lottery agent, or as a reporter, etc. I do not cheerfully proclaim the errors of youth, but I regard Mr. Braun to be mature enough to be conscious of the fact that his acts are not compatible with the requirements of honesty.

With patriotic, friendly greetings, I am,

DESIDERIOUS ZOCHOR,
President of the Society.

From Paris Marcus Braun sailed to New York, where, in consequence of a libel suit which Marcus Braun had begun before the Budapest royal court, which, however, later on, before the final trial had taken place, he had withdrawn, divers witnesses' unanimous testimony shows that one Geza Horvath had accused Marcus Braun, in the presence of various inhabitants of New York, to have stolen from him a fur coat and from his wife a gold watch and chain. The fur coat had been found in his house. Braun admitted to have committed the theft and made the loss good, for which Horvath, at the prayer of Braun, abstained from making a complaint. The numerous witnesses examined in New York, at least a majority of them, characterized Marcus Braun as an ordinary adventurer. And such a man dares to attack me, who has been for many years in and has served with honor the state police department of the capital.

HUGO KALMAR.

In this same matter the Budapesti Tudosito has been authorized from competent sources to publish the following:

"It is not true that Marcus Braun, alleged American Government commissioner, had appeared before minister president to make a complaint there. The American consul-general reported yesterday by telephone to the officials of the ministry of the interior the transgressions allegedly committed against Braun. The minister president received his information from hearing of the complaint of Marcus Braun through this official of the ministry of the interior, when he immediately called upon the police department for an explanatory report. To Marcus Braun, however, there had been given by competent authority the advice to make a criminal complaint against the detective."

Marcus Braun makes the following declaration concerning the foregoing:

"The press bureau of the police department published to-day a declaration of a detective of the State police wherein he heaps defamatory abuse upon me. Inasmuch as I am in Hungary on an official mission as the immigration inspector of the United States, I had, through my ambassador, immediately made report to the American Government about the attack on me attempted. It is therefore impossible for me to take notice of the single details of that article until I should have received instructions from my Government concerning the atonement for these daring and unheard-of insults. True to the facts, however, I must state that the detective giving to the public the certain article is identical with the person whom I caught at the hotel examining my letters and whom I then and there publicly held responsible.

"MARCUS BRAUN,
"Immigration Inspector of the United States."

EXHIBIT No. 18.

DEAR MR. BERKOVITZ: The sample copies of your honorable newspaper, which until now you had sent me, I received. I have read them carefully. I thank you very much, your amiability, and I promise to be always your ready servant.

Now, however, allow me to reflect upon your issue, No. 150, of June 30 of the running year, wherein you write not to have given credence to the charges made against Marcus Braun. You are greatly in error, Mr. Berkovitz, because those charges are not false, but they are pure, exact truths, namely, Marcus Braun had stolen, misappropriated, and cheated. These he might deny, but nevertheless they are facts and are true. This circumstance I am ready to anyone at any time and with official documents and by the requisition issued by the royal prosecutor of Budapest, which directs his apprehension for divers thefts, defalcation, and fraudulent transactions.

Braun, knowing these things, escaped from his then residence, No. 8 Haynal street. It is true that these crimes have long ago been outlawed, and the brother of Marcus Braun, Darius Braun, who is well known to the police, informed Marcus Braun that under these circumstances he might come back, and it was fortunate for Marcus Braun that at that time he was not apprehended, or he would have tasted the air of the prison. These are the facts, as I already mentioned—sacred truths.

You write that his enemies say of him that he has committed divers thefts, defalcations, and frauds. I am not an enemy of Braun. I only write these things to you because I know of your fighting for the truth and you proclaim this; therefore somebody probably must have been misleading you, and you gave him credence. I have already mentioned, and it is a fact and the truth—anyhow, I have published these things here officially in all of the daily newspapers of Budapest on May 11, this year, through the channel of the police bureau. Marcus Braun read this here in Budapest, but he did not do aught but to deny them, although I expected that for public defamation he would begin an action against me, and my superiors earnestly advised him to do so, and I myself—I very much would have liked him to sue me; at least he would have given me opportunity and chance to prove it before the forum of the court that he has stolen, misappropriated, and defrauded, and is thus but a common cheat, over whom the police must, indeed, keep a watch. Therefore, as I already have said, that I well know of your fighting for the truth, and you proclaim it, I pray very much to publish this declaration of mine in your honorable journal. Let it be known in America who is Marcus Braun, or if dear Mr. Berkovitz, for any reason, could not grant me this request, then I earnestly beg of you to inform me at once, appealing to your good friendship; because then I, only in the interest of truth, will send in English language, will send to the New York newspapers, with the explanation that I am not at all guided by any vindictiveness.

In conclusion, I inform you that I could write very much more about Marcus Braun's scoundrelisms, anyhow. I am working upon a pamphlet of which I will send a copy to the President of the Republic, wherein there will be set out the deeds of scoundrelism of Marcus Braun in his native country and in Europe, so that if, indeed, he be an employee of the United States, that he has cheated even his own Government, of which I have proof, and he is capable to defraud all America, together with the President thereof.

And now allow me to turn to you with a prayer. Alexander Braun, a brother of Marcus Braun, of Budapest, 22 years old, here lately clerk in an office, after defalcating 1,600 crowns, ran away last year to America to Marcus Braun. I am instructed to look for him and apprehend him. I request you very much, dear Mr. Berkovitz, to write to me whether you know this miscreant, whether he is there in New York with Marcus Braun, and whether in some way this scoundrel could be arrested.

After all these, I pray your indulgence if I have intruded on your time too long, but knowing your good will to me, you will not be angry at me.

Your favor of a reply awaiting, I remain, with sincere and friendly greetings,

Your devoted friend and ready servant,

HUGO KALMÁR.

EXHIBIT No. 19.

GRAND HOTEL HUNGARIA,
Budapest, August 25, 1905.

HONORED MR. BERKOVITZ: Your honored letter of the 4th instant I have received. I make bold to make this reply. I very much regret that you think of not having sent the police reports for the reason because I have begrudged the putting on them the expense of the postage stamps. You are greatly in error, because the police reports have ceased to be published with the 1st of June; now are published the Police Journal, and these are published by the ministry of the interior.

And now allow me honored Mr. Berkovitz, that I might turn to the doings of Marcus Braun, I do not reflect upon his political actions, but now, as I did before, I again maintain that he had stolen, defrauded, and cheated. I greatly regret, however, that I can not send you my complete proofs, because they are in part deposited in the archives of the royal court at Budapest and partly in the archives of the Budapest police department deposited as official documents, and from them to take or legalized copies to take is not possible, but here in Budapest

I am writing to justify my allegations to anybody, and I annex a police requisition from the year 1891, wherein he is being sought by the Budapest royal court for the crime of fraud and orders his arrest, but he had then escaped already, and thus was freed of the prison.

You, honored Mr. Berkovitz, write in your letter that Marcus Braun is not a cheat, but I think I have proven that he did cheat, and I also can prove that he has stolen and misappropriated. You furthermore write that Braun was in Budapest in 1894, 1895, 1896, and 1899. That is very possible, but he had come here secretly, and the authorities have not learned of it or else he would have been apprehended. Lately we have ascertained that in 1899 he had been here with a certain Kiralyfi, under an assumed name, and has taken girls out to America, and inasmuch as this is only a misdemeanor it became outlawed in a year.

And now, dear Mr. Berkovitz, permit me reflect upon that declaration of yours which you write in your letter, that Braun would be a lunatic fit for a strait-jacket if he would resign from his position to sue me and to seek his honor. This, in my opinion, is a very sorrowful and pitiable condition of things, if a man does not sacrifice his position to save his honor, because I think that positions in life a man can get plentiful, but not his honor, and I do believe that you, too, believe me when I declare that without honor a man's life is not worth anything.

But just now the thing comes to a focus, because these days I read in Budapest, Vienna, and Berlin newspapers that Braun has been relieved of his position. True, certain newspapers have written that it was proven what the police of Budapest had said, that Braun had stolen, defalcated, and defrauded, while certain newspapers reported of he having resigned because he would have had to carry uniform. Well, this last, I believe, not even the bell ringer of the Therese district will believe him, because a man who defends himself therewith that he does not seek vindication because he would have to resign from his position, but who does resign on account of his uniform he would have to wear, that is a very nice alternative. In the paper of the 11th instant you had sent me, I also read that Braun had resigned for the reason because he did not want to wear an uniform with bright buttons, but, Mr. Editor, you had added thereto that Braun had at one time worn bright buttons for Francis Joseph. Concerning this I inform you that Braun had been honvéd private in the First Honvéd Infantry Regiment, but there he conducted himself as in private life, he became a fugitive, for which he was already in 1888 hunted and his arrest ordered. I inclose herewith a police requisition wherein he is shown to be placarded.

Dear Mr. Berkovitz, I do not wish to continue this writing. I believe I have half way justified my allegation—entirely I will prove it in my pamphlet—but you can tell Braun, with whom I am told you stand on good footing, that I am to his disposition; now he has no position, now he can sue me; let him come here, and let him face me before the courts that I may prove of he having stolen, cheated, and defalcated.

And now I repeatedly request you, dear Mr. Berkovitz, inasmuch as you write of being ready to serve me in any manner, to tell me whether Alexander Braun, the brother of Marcus Braun, who last year had misappropriated 1,600 crowns and ran away to New York to Marcus Braun, be in New York, and how he could be apprehended.

Now, I beg your pardon if upon your valuable time I have intruded, and I promise to be ever your ready servant.

With special esteem and patriotic greeting,

KALMAR HUGO.

Answer to Marcus Braun's American commissioner's newspaper attacks upon me. Written by Alexander Hajos. Price, 20 filler. Purchasable in tobacco shops.

To the Magyar public:

The Nap, in its issue of the 14th instant, accuses a man by the name of "Hajos" to compromise Marcus Braun, American immigration commissioner, with defamatory letters, and to have given to Detective Kalmar, in the matter against Braun, untruthful statements. This Mr. Hajos had been a member of the Munich-Hungarian Society, and stood there in the center of many scandalous things. Finally, Hajos has flooded the American authorities with letters defamatory of Braun, which even had come into the hands of Roosevelt, the President of the Republic.

It is true I know Braun personally since June, 1892, when he had come to New York, and have occasionally met him there. I published there, on account of his blackmailing operations, a very sharp article, for which, at that time, he began a libel suit against me; but it is also true that he thought it advisable to drop the matter before trial, because he well knew, to have collected against him very many weighty proofs, which proofs are deposited in the archives of the criminal court of this city.

Thus it is easily understood that the attacks of the Nap I must regard to have been directed against me, and I must, to my sorrow, assume them.

But it is not true of ever having been in Munich, and therefore it is clearly visible that I never could have stood there in the center of any scandal. Considering the accusation of having given to Detective Kalmar defamatory letters about Braun, it is a stupid falsehood, because I see the police found, without any aid of mine, the compromising documents deposited since 1897 with the criminal court, and which date from my law case.

The documents at the criminal court officially prove that Braun had stolen and misappropriated, had throughout years lived upon blackmail and many-sided revolver journalism. Thus, what for any compromising letter? But, if Mr. Braun should desire them, I can serve him. But they are not letters, but authenticated data as to his dishonorable mode of life, of newer date.

What concerns the accusation of being such or such slanderer, the writer of the article of the Nap and of the Függ Magy will have to respond thereto before the Press Tribunal. The latter newspapers at least, have spared me to the extent of having only mentioned me in general only as a slanderer.

That I have flooded the American authorities with defamatory letters concerning Braun and these even reached the hands of Roosevelt, the President of the Republic, is a matter for which I will turn for redress to our ambassador at Washington, Mr. Hengelmüller.

At the time when Braun attempted to blackmail the directory of the Millennium Exposition, respectively the Hungarian Government, to the tune of $15,000=75,000 crowns, the Pester Lloyd, the credibility and seriousness of which is recognized even in foreign countries, declared Braun, in an official declaration, to be a blackmail operator. But Braun did not yield. He threatened he would attack the exposition and the Government in foreign newspapers, and which will be proven in this pamphlet. In consequence of this, I, knowing him, thought it to be my duty for the public welfare, to air his American past career in the semiofficial Nemzet, the seriousness of which newspaper is likewise not to be doubted.

I fought him with open visor. In detail I proved that he is everything except an honorable man. He remained silent or rather said he stopped the libel suit he had begun. Thus in my article, which as is also the article of the Pester Lloyd, here reprinted in full, he is laid low morally. Therefore what other need have I to attack him, when with easy method, in the interest of the public, I have already conquered over him morally? In truth, I would but prepare a certificate of moral poverty for myself, if against this morally dead man I would fight a combat. It is evident that these rumors of my having sent to the American authorities defamatory letters are gigantic lies, such as only Braun can tell.

My belief is strong that President Roosevelt, who is mentioned here, will respond truthfully, even if by his response he would hurt his man. But if perchance—what I do not suppose—the very esteemed Mr. President would refuse to give explanation, then I will ask him through the London Times.

I am further with my personal reputation. In my life I was forced only once, and then by Braun, to wash his dirty linen—what he was made to feel sufficiently. Now I can sufficiently wonder how Braun, knowing of being in the lurch, should, after nine years, arouse me out of my rest. Why does he pick at me? Why does he force me to reckon with him once again before the public? I do not understand it. It might be that it hurts him that the documents by me collected and deposited with the court have been hurled at his head, but anybody could have looked into those documents.

That he is the author of the newspaper attack against me is visible from the fact that since years I have nothing to do with newspaper writing; formerly, too, I but wrote occasionally—as graduated agricultural economist I wrote upon subjects of my calling. I have absolutely no acquaintanceship in newspaper circles, so that he must have begun the chase. The "Nap" again is his mouthpiece; he commenced therein on the 11th already, and in a three-column long article, his attacks upon the police, although it is plain that Mr. Rudnay had been willing quietly to accord him all the satisfaction; but this grand master of the scandal mongers wished to shine before all of the world. Thus did I come, too, in the dark "Nap," and it is beyond doubt that I was dragged into it by the still blacker Braun.

I publish here verbatim the articles of the Pester Lloyd and of the Nemzet. The earnestness, the credibility of these two newspapers require no commentaries.

LAW-COURT NEWS—A LAWSUIT FOR NEWSPAPER ARTICLES ABOUT THE EXPOSITION.

In the circuit court of the United States, a kind of central court for civil causes in the United States, a lawsuit has been entered on a claim for $15,000 against our exposition—that is to say, indirectly against the Hungarian Government. According to the Bond. Taghl, this is the affair: Marcus Braun, a born Hungarian, but a naturalized American citizen, who had been sojourning here in New York during the Millennium festivities, representing, as reporter, the New York daily—The World, was, as he claims, recommended about a year ago—the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general at New York making the recommendation—as the man who would be most suitable to do in America the booking thereof. The exposition commission authorized the consul-general to intrust that mission to Mr. Braun, and allowed him a fee of 50 fl. for each large and 25 fl. for each smaller newspaper article which he would put into the American newspapers. Mr. Braun took the matter in a genuinely American way into his hands, and he placed not less than 4,000 of these articles in American newspapers, for which, as he reckons it, he now has a demand of $15,000. When at the end of May his bill, which then had already been several thousand dollars, was presented, he was paid 500 fl., and he could not receive any responses to his letters and demands for the payment of his bill.

Mr. Braun, who claims to have made, on his part, contracts with newspapers, came then to Budapest to insist upon the recognition of his claims, but everywhere he found deaf ears. Ministerial Councilor Schmidt, the director of the exposition, acknowledged that he had done great service to the exposition, but laid stress upon the circumstance that this does not exclude of him being a nuisance to the directory.

When Braun's steps at the Government proved also of no avail, there remained nothing else for him than the appeal to law, and in the opinion of his American lawyer friends, the American courts have jurisdiction in the matter. When asked how he could collect a judgment, should he get one, he responded that this was very easy, and told of a case wherein about two years ago a claim against the Spanish Government, which had been sued on and was in the form of a judgment, was collected by levying upon the first Spanish man-of-war that entered an American port.

LAW COURT NEWS.

A lawsuit for newspaper articles about the exposition. Referring to the notice under this heading in our issue of yesterday and taken from the Bud. Tagbl. we are being assured that the Exposition Commission had not given to Marcus Braun the authority set forth in that notice. Mr. Braun collected a number of American newspapers, in which he found short notices about the Millennium Exposition, telegraphic news about the political festivities, etc., etc., and claimed for each of these "exposition articles" a remuneration which, according to our standard, is altogether out of proportion. This claim had naturally to be rejected. Newspaper clippings can be had by the thousand and the exposition commission can have them very cheaply.

HUNGARIAN REVOLVER IN AMERICA.

We received the following letter, which by reason of its exceptionally interest contents deserves the attention of the Magyar public, as well as that of the Hungarians who had emigrated to America and that of the consulates in that country:

DEAR MR. EDITOR: In consequence of the news item that one Marcus Braun, an American newspaper man, demands by law the payment to him of $15,000—that is to say, of 37,500 Austrian fl.—by the directors of the Millennium Exposition, I deem it worth while, necessary, even my patriotic duty, to say one and the other thing about that gentleman. And why? It will, in the course of what is being told here, be plainly apparent.

Incalculable is the damage which this "compatriot" journalist of ours working on both hemispheres has been causing and is still causing among the Hungarians emigrating to the United States, the number of which emigrants might exceed a round million souls.

Our daily newspapers just now publish with peculiar sarcasm the notice of the claim of Marcus Braun, alias Marc Braun, originally of Budapest, but now an American journalist, who demands of the directors of the Millennium Exposition $15,000, or 37,500 Austrian gulden, for newspaper articles of an advertising character which he had published.

I must state here in advance that the Hungarians in the United States have since decades had the good fortune that might there as many of us or of what caliber of men might come there, all were received with enthusiasm, which, considering this dry, cold, not too fiery Anglo-American race must indeed be regarded as a marvel. It was not inquired into whether he be a Slovac or a Magyar, he was simply asked whether he first saw the light in Hungary and out of that compatriot promptly became a "My dear sir," he received support at all sides and wherever he looked for it. These conditions we might be grateful for to our revolution and later on to the famous speeches of Louis Kossuth.

This bias for us extended to every single Hungarian, which grew to be, while in search for his daily bread, for him a source of an unspeakable blessing. It is true, one or the other countryman of ours might have meanly misused his position, and for this slowly and by degrees this sympathy for us seemed to have been lessened. The press of that country dealt but very reservedly and very rarely with the Magyars of New York and other cities, everywhere living among themselves, but Mr. Braun soon, and to the sorrow of the Hungarians, very effectually changed these conditions.

This man lives exclusively on denouncing the Hungarians to the Americans—for money, of course—and under favorable conditions to revolverize, to blackmail, the Hungarians. To make his denunciations catchy and eagerly sought for by the newspapers, Mr. Braun ornaments them with divers sensational trimmings and with issues, and then gives them to the World or the Herald or whatever paper might pay most for them. It need not even be explained that the highest aim of the American newspapers is to beat one another with the publication of the most sensational and interesting news items ("item" is an article respecting a piece of news which no other newspaper has as yet published). Their truth or their influence or consequence of the publication is of no matter to those papers.

The "chronique scandaleuse" of the American press of to-day daily ruins, morally or financially, one or two or more Hungarian families, and this is Mr. Braun's merit. Before ruining the victim he has sought out. Braun first calls upon him and demands of him that of the sum which in his own (B's) opinion the victim had dishonestly earned or obtained, he be given so much and so much or else he would denounce him in the newspapers and annihilate him. Many submit to blackmail and pay so as to escape notoriety and trouble. Some pay with blows they deal to him lustily, but this does not prevent him in the continuation of his mode of life in this manner.

Thus, since two or three years, because this blissful work of Mr. Braun takes only since 1893, the American newspapers are continuously full of reports of the scoundrelism and the miserability of all sorts of the Hungarians. One after the other of the newspapers copy these accusations, and the result is that to-day the Hungarian has the meanest reputation of all foreigners amongst the Americans. Wherever he might knock for work he is looked upon with suspicion and prejudice, and he has difficulty, indeed, to secure work. If we consider now that about one million Hungarians are living in the United States, it is with horror that we look upon the work of this compatriot of ours, who misuses his position. The greater part of our immigrants from Hungary are the Slovacs from the northern country; but even they must suffer from it. According to the prevailing opinion, he, being born in Hungary, must be taken as a bad character, wanton, unreliable. He can secure work, but because he is a Hungarian he is paid meaner than his fellow-laborers working with him in the coal mines or at the oil wells.

When the work becomes slack, it is the Hungarian Slovac who is first to remain without bread. These outgoing compatriots of ours are a great economical factor; our newspapers have but lately pointed out how many million dollars do they send home annually by mail. Without any exception, every Slovac, coming back when he had been out there years, brings with him from $600 to $800, 1,500 to 2,000 florins, which he has saved up; he buys a piece of land; he builds a home, keeps a horse, drives a wagon. He is at home, a tax-paying citizen; he sustains the State out of his American earnings.

To-day the sympathy of the Americans for the Magyar is nil. If in American press there be something bad to say, the Hungarian is being put forth as the victim; he is guilty of everything and of anything, and of this change in the public opinion Mr. Braun has a very considerable share.

In the beginning of his American career, in 1894, Braun had handed in a clever "item" which attacked the reputation of thirty-eight Hungarians, all innocent, of course, but of whom he wanted to squeeze a dollar or two of each, but who refused to submit. At about that time the municipality of the city of New York came into the hands of the temperance people. Obsolete laws were resuscitated, the playing of cards was prohibited, but the scope of this order was not clear.

Our countrymen continued to cultivate in Hungarian coffee houses the "Tardly" and the "Kalaber," when lo, one Saturday afternoon the police enters one of these Hungarian coffee houses wherein thirty-nine Hungarian artisans were gathered, and arrests all those present, confiscated even the tables on which they had—for the lowest stakes imaginable—played.

In such cases, as it is there the rule or custom, the guests are never punished, the proprietor is usually fined $5, and the matter is ended. Well, in consequence of this raid many Hungarians, among them myself, were dragged to the police station house, where Braun visited us. He spoke to the "pater familas" temporarily arrested, wanted to frighten them, demanded money, but they, convinced of their innocence, refused to pay.

After a few hours' delay, during which the record of the arrest was taken, we all were taken before the police court and we all were discharged. Next day the newspapers published, to the astonishment of the entire Magyar colony, the story of the life of thirty-nine absolutely innocent Hungarian people, of course put into a form and of course by our Mr. Braun, from which it seemed to appear as if some hidden, great crime had been committed. The outcry against him was great, but Braun laughed; he had received a few dollars for the item.

Such and similar happenings repeated themselves innumerable times. Braun is fishing more successfully in turbid waters, the condition of the Magyars grows constantly worse, and this is the case since that gentleman has erected his tent in New York.

His mission consists everywhere where he can to create false conditions or positions, which is pretty easily brought about among the less educated classes, and then to take advantage of this for his own use and benefit.

To this manner did Mr. Braun secure his connection with the American press, which it is to be regretted is not acquainted with the true condition of affairs and is easily misled. He makes a good living out of it, but it is often that the Magyar emigrant is made to suffer in consequence of his heartlessness.

ALEXANDER HAJOS.

The personal affair I have now finished on my part with this pamphlet. The Lloyd's official communication and the fact to have been frightened off his libel suit shows me to be right, which, however, is not much when opposed to Braun. It requires no proof that only public interest engaged me against him. We clearly see his stubbornness in the exposition matter, which yielded only when I laid bare, in its entire nakedness, his past and made it known to the public. I fulfilled a duty; I passed on, saying: "The Moor had done his duty, the Moor can go."

In the present case Braun's individuality plays no longer any rôle. To-day there can be no longer any question of Kalmar, Roosevelt, Rudnay, or of my modest self. Now, it is necessary to put the affair, which, by the scandal-chasing faculty of Braun, had been by him most cleverly involved into an international matter, in such a light before the public that the same should be graspable at one view, and then the blown-up soap-bubble will burst and the old condition of affairs will, without any harm having been done, be reestablished.

Now, as in 1896, knowing Braun and the circumstances, I look into the woven web and—uncalled for, probably; but provoked by him—therefore with some justification, I help the straightening out of the entanglement.

To-day the public moral of Hungary is forced into the foreground; that must not be permitted to suffer any harm, only the boastful hero therein playing a rôle might fall.

That I arrogate to myself the right to enter into this affair might find its explanation also in the circumstance that about four weeks ago, when the newspapers announced the coming of this prominent man into our midst, I had written to one of the daily papers that this bodes no good. Let us call the attention of the proper authorities that, instead of this gentleman, let there be, in time, some one else sent here, another commissioner; but this notice of mine remained unheeded. And thus the thing happened which ought not to have happened.

A Hungarian is being insulted in a public place and is almost treated with blows. The unfortunate fellow, perchance an officer in public service, feeling his innocence, the contrary of which no one has as yet proven, complains against his aggressor. The aggressor, properly, as everywhere, had been fined. The aggressor, a prominent stranger, receives from the proper authorities guarantees that the Hungarian who it is said had opened his letters will receive exemplary punishment, naturally, however, only then, if such crime be proven him. "That is not enough," says the prominent stranger, "I want his head to fall right now." But the administration of justice does not permit that, and he does not receive that head.

The prominent stranger forthwith begins with hand and feet an attack against the Hungarian police in the form of a three-column-long newspaper article entitled "Cabinet noir," and with all power, but without any reason, he rings the bells of danger. That is understood of itself that the police of the capital could not allow this to go unheeded. This corporation, which had all the opportunity to look into the past of men, discovers in the past life of this prominent stranger serious moral defects, and lays them before that prominent stranger's nostrils.

The American gentleman grows angry and starts a noise, attempts to bring about an international conflict, into which the dignity of our fatherland is dragged, and into the center of that conflict he, by reason of his scandal-loving nature and character, puts himself. From this position I do not budge neither right nor left. But international conflicts are usually arranged that not the individual but the nation steps into the foreground. Clearing from the artificial web and woof the individuality, and we will see that our police has only punished the uncalled-for attacks of Braun. It is immaterial, then, if it happens that the police had found the very weak moral side of that gentleman, but if a fellow carries butter on his head let him walk in the shade.

In short, if that prominent stranger steps out of the self-woven web, the affair stands clearly before us and is in good order. The repulsive moral ulcers and sores make his remaining here impossible; he therefore gathers his tent and goes to Russia; he had, anyhow, the intention to go there, and we wish him a happy voyage. But no; he does not step out of the circle of the self-woven web; he remains in the center of that international conflict, and he remains there because he is inspired to do so. Some well-meaning daily newspaper handles the affair, I do not say mala fide, but does it at the cost of the prestige of Hungary, and enables the man to continue his artistic humbuggery. Let us see; probably we can help to counteract these peculiar symptoms.

Let us say, for instance, that there came to Hatszeg—a place in which I never have been—and into a quasi gentlemanly circle of that place, a stranger. This stranger is an elegant, cultured gentleman; but after six months it turns out that in his manhood days he had for years lived upon blackmail and many-sided revolverisms. Naturally he will be bowed out of good society. It is disagreeable to everybody. It would have been a great deal better if all of this had come to the light of the day before he had entered it, but it is too late. Be this as it may, that stranger no more can enter that circle. This is everywhere the same—that is to say, a loafer is a loafer, even if his true character becomes known only at a later day.

A great part of the daily press says that it fully accepts the former criminal life of Braun, but that now, as long as he is here, all is expiated; that it is immaterial to us to know what he had been, and who he had been heretofore, now that he is here it would have been the bounden duty of the ministry to regard him as a perfect gentleman and to treat him as such.

This is the salient point of the case. This man who, according to the Pester Lloyd, is morally dead, and who has blackmailed the exposition commissioners and the Banffy government, is to-day discussing with our Government authorities in matters of supreme importance. (At this place it might not be inopportune to ask whether this individual who had been rejected by a former government by reason of his bad reputation, does possess impartiality to discuss his mission unprejudiced and unbiased. The absence of his impartiality is proven by the circumstance that he now attacks me, without any cause or reason, because nine years ago in a matter flowing out of the exposition I had something to do with him, showing that the blows he received in 1896 he had not been able to forget.)

These newspapers to-day demand categorically that the leading Government circles should show deference to him and without any scruples continue to discuss matters with him.

Oh, no; this Government is our Government, and our Government can not enter into any discussion with a man who, in consequence of his past, can not receive entrance into respectable society, who by a former government and by a most prominent newspaper has been morally battered; and if this view is clear, then the whole affair stands from one end to the other clearly before me. I know that the very smallest village justice, who has any pride at all in his Magyar nationality reddens with shame to his ears should he hear that his Government is having confab with such a man as that; reddens with shame to his ears, because that man dared to blackmail our dearest institution (the exposition); reddens with shame because that man has insulted and injured our countryman.

But the Hungarian peasant would feel ashamed, even if this man, traveling on an important mission, had committed these things not in our country, but, say, in Egypt. Let it be understood and accepted as a thesis axiomatic, that a man, who, by reason of his past can not be received into a respectable private circle, is not fit to confer in matters of importance with the government of a great nation, and here it is that the public morality of Hungary must be victorious.

If this side of the case is put into the proper light, then that gentleman will again go away and all will be well. We will receive in his place another American gentleman who, though we do not know personally, but with him the government can arrange the pending affairs.

It is therefore a very erroneous proposition that an officer, be he whoever he may, having begun functions, has by doing so expiated his former criminal deeds.

It is a well-known story how at the end of the seventies Editor John Asboth laid bare the past of Councilor Count Zichy-Ferraris, and the count went away. According to the logic of to-day in those newspapers, he was not correct; he should have remained in office although formerly he had been caught stealing silver spoons. With this new logic we place into the hands of Mr. Braun a new weapon and he is smart enough to use it.

The official communication printed in the Pester Lloyd and which for nine years had not been denied has received its denial to-day. A high official of the Millennium Exposition, who enjoys, as a capacity in industrial matters and as a private gentleman, the highest esteem and respect, declares that Braun at that time had performed valuable services for the exposition and has received 6,000 crowns as remuneration.

Whatever may be said, that communication exists after nine years' silence. It can not be annihilated or disavowed. It is evidently fuel on which Braun can feed. He has with that given a kick to the Banffy Government then in office, to the directorate of the exposition, and to the official communication.

Thus to-day Braun stands before us as a man immaculate. Thus to-day the Pester Lloyd, the exposition, the Hungarian Government, etc., all Hungary is put to blame—please continue this—let all the more water flow upon the mills for Braun.

That official report of the Lloyd can not be wiped out of existence, even by the prime minister of that day.

If I were to carry this case into a personal discussion, I would ask any high-school student how is it possible to gather such great merits for an internal exposition in America which deserve to be remunerated with 6,000 crowns?

I could also ask that if some one has achieved great merits by his services for our land, for which services he presents a bill of 75,000 crowns, why is he only paid 6,000 crowns? This is a compromise on a basis of 7½ per cent. I did not know until now that the Hungarian Government pays the bills of persons who have achieved merits on a basis of 7½ per cent proposition. A compromise of debt on a basis of 7½ per cent is considered to be a fraudulent bankruptcy and the punishment thereof is the penitentiary.

I could ask a great deal more. I only ask now how does the official communication of the Pester Lloyd in 1896 cover the explanation of the former chief secretary of the commission, wherein he informed us of the payment of the 6,000 crowns? What is here disavowed? In my view it is doubtless that the Pester Lloyd is not refuted.

Under all circumstances it is a great pity that such weapons are placed in the hands of Braun. With this he is enabled all the more to push himself to the foreground, and we might expect that in consequence thereof our land might be subjected to an international blame.

Very well, four weeks before Braun's coming here had been published in the newspapers I had an idea that his being here will not end without some scandal. I am sorry to see that my tip proved correct. After an article in the Nemzet I had promised myself to have nothing to do with him any more. At the end of my libel suit against him I received material against him from New York, but I had made up my mind not to wash my dirty linen any more.

(Thus a few years ago my attention had been called to a man named Goddard, who at that time was the secretary of Roosevelt, then the governor of the State of New York. By clever maneuvering Braun became friendly with this secretary. Through him he became acquainted with Roosevelt, and then it is said he betrayed Goddard. Anyway, Braun became the favorite of the President. Goddard did not care about the thing; he was a millionaire, and was a politician only as a matter of pastime. I neglected this whole matter and paid no attention to it out of respect to R.)

But I made an exception four weeks ago, because I saw the scandal coming and wished to prevent it. I wrote to the Pesti Hirlap and inclosed the articles of the Lloyd and of the Nemzet. I called its attention to this person who, in 1896, had been ruthlessly rejected by the Government. I wrote that it would be well to call the attention of the present Government to this man, because it will not do to see the Government enter into a conference upon important national affairs with a man of such dishonorable antecedents and a scandal monger. I declared that here it is not the question of the person of Braun; that it is a question of decency, of morality; that it would be a slap in the face of public morality in Hungary should this man be received in Budapest.

The article did not appear. True, had the article been printed I would have had to carry the burden, but it is sure that the American ambassador would have in time received from the Ballplatz, which, given with a hand in kid gloves, concerning the recall of Mr. Braun.

We would therefore have been spared the international scandal, the world would not have been the witness of the fight between our police and Mr. Braun.

Therefore, it is seen, I gave the right "tip," and probably this proves it also of having worked in the interest of the public welfare. I say "probably" because there are many who say let there be a scandal, it is no one's business. With such fatalists I do not enter into any discussion. At the most I would enter into a discussion with those who say that I had personal reasons to raise this hue and cry; to these I could easily prove of having been moved by public interests.

After this confession I am prepared to see myself assailed by the press, which takes Mr. Braun's part. I will hardly take notice of it, however, because I have no connection with newspapers, the press is shut out from me; to write a new pamphlet I have not the time.

I make, however, one declaration that, whatever insult may be heaped upon me out of this matter I shall not regret it, otherwise I would regard it, but now I leave it to the action of the court. If anyone can discover in my past career any such a thing which I hurled at the head of Braun in 1896, I am willing to pray for his pardon, but not otherwise. I do not envy his beautifully rounded out career, because a man who does not resent such attacks on him as have made on him the Pester Lloyd and the Nemzet is not to be envied.

In consequence of his attack I have been sought out by a number of people and I have been asked how is it that a man with such a past has not been made impossible before this in New York by the Hungarians of fifteen to twenty thousand people there residing, and why is it I who is laying bare his career here at home? The majority of our Hungarians over there are journeymen artisans. They do not know how to write polemics. They shun publicity, and if some one blackmails them they prefer to pay. The intelligent part of the colony living over there are shipwrecked figures. I myself was one of them when I had stepped upon the shore of America. Add to this that the intelligent part of the colony which would be able to wield the pen has to a great extent dark pasts, and they do not like to be bothered about the past and prefer to pay and refuse to assume a public rôle. And if it does not fear the past, then there is the struggle for life with an extraordinary difficult battle to secure foothold in the strange land which embitters the life of the light-blooded intelligency there living. Through this apathy and this "what-do-we-care" attitude had Braun been able to terrorize and to misuse the Hungarian colony. No one cared for him.

Suddenly in 1896 general attention is called to his daring attempt to blackmail in a great style the exposition to the tune of 75,000 crowns. To know and to see that a Hungarian ruins his compatriots living far away, to know and to see that the same fellow coming home intends to blackmail his fatherland and the Hungarian Government out of a large sum of money, is, I respectfully suggest, if a man has but a tiny drop of feeling for his fatherland, impossible to disregard in silence, and this solely, and solely this unheard of proceeding on his part was the moving power of my attack on him.

Do not let us forget that the exposition of 1896, in honor of the one thousand years' existence of our nation, was of that glorious feast the most brilliant symbol of which the whole of the civilized world had taken notice. Now, one of our own blood dares to attempt to desecrate the memory of this festival for his own selfish aims. This can not be tolerated by one who knows the true condition of affairs. Braun had emigrated after he had been a soldier and it is hardly fifteen years since he went away. In too short a time there had died out in him his sympathy for his native land, but that is Hekuba to him, be it Roosevelt or the Millennium Exposition, the main point is that he should find the cow giving plenty of milk.

I can not acquit the police of Budapest of the reproach to have committed a tactical error concerning Braun.

I have heretofore said that the lowest path of the intelligence of our emigrated compatriots has a dark past, and this is better known by the police than by myself. It is now four weeks that all of the Hungarian newspapers announced that a gentleman of Hungarian birth will come as an American commissioner of immigration to this city to confer with the Government on important national affairs. Therefore they knew that this man about to come must be an intelligent man. Why did not the police immediately look after to find out what is the truth about the kaleidoscopic changes in the career of this man, and who is he, anyway?

The ministry of foreign affairs could within twenty hours receive from the consulate and from others detailed information. In consequence of this we would not have had the pleasure to receive Braun, and the hauling over of our police department in the press of all the world would not have been a necessity.

But not only then, when the scandal had been provoked, when the American consul had taken his part, then and only then are cablegrams sent, and even announce that they have done so, which on one side shows that the police department was really in trouble and on the other side shows that they had not given any credence to the American consul.

Facing such a man, who, without any rhyme or reason, simply because of his sickly conceit and vanity to create a sensation, and his usual scandal-monger habits—who, without any rhyme or reason, with cold blood, tolls the bells, it would have been in place to deal more carefully, with further forethought, because it should have been known that he will coin capital out of it.

I wish to state that my criticism here is based simply upon the happenings of events as I have learned them from the newspapers.

All this, however, does not change anything upon the subject, and the main thing is that Braun had made his attack without any reason; that for this he had been fined, and inasmuch as it is doubtless true that he had the intention to blackmail the Hungarian State as he for years blackmailed his Hungarian compatriots. Therefore, there can be no room for him here, and thus is evened and smoothed over the entangled affair into which he himself had brought disorder.

It is not excluded that extraordinarily, single-headed, and energetic Yankee might receive for the sake of peace satisfaction to which he might not be entitled, but, on the other hand, might be given to him so as to get rid of him because of his past career, excludes the probability of his acting here in fiduciary capacity.

In conclusion only one word more. Knowing this gentleman and knowing his splendid attainments as an agent provocateur, his mania to hunt up scandal and strife, it is my innermost conviction that the entire story of the opening of his mail and violation of the secrecy of the mail is but a great humbug.

If anyone has committed any violation of the secrecy of the letters of Mr. Marcus Braun, this anyone can not be aught else but Marcus Braun, immigrant inspector, himself, and could stake my life on this.

But I do not stake my head on this as yet because here in Budapest he might find some God-forsaken, hungry people who for money would assume to have opened his letters and who would be willing to be imprisoned for this for six or nine months, and then I would lose my head. It is for this that I do not give Mr. Braun the pleasure of seeing my head on the guillotine. It suffices if the poor detective's head falls as his victim. It is a fact that for once in his life he had very awkwardly arranged matters.

There happened a similar thing in 1894 in New York in the center of which our Mr. Braun stood. Now I remember only hazily the details, but if he desires it I will give him more exhaustive information.

EXHIBIT No. 22.

BUDAPEST, HUNGARY, May 15, 1905.

Hon. BELLAMY STORER,
United States Ambassador and Envoy Plenipotentiary, Vienna.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to your consideration a statement about the insult, degradation, humiliation, injustice, and unlawful treatment to which I have been subjected by officials of the Royal Hungarian Government, both in my official and private capacity, and for which I ask all such reparation as you may see wise and fit to demand.

At the outset, however, I desire to invite your attention that inasmuch as most of my evidence is of a circumstantial nature, I would respectfully request not to use this statement before the foreign office of the Austro-Hungarian Government or the ministries of the Royal Hungarian Government, because I do not feel warranted to submit my case to any of the departments of courts of this country neither for trial nor for investigation, for the reason that the experience I had so far convinced me fully that I have been singled out as a victim of a plot and conspiracy by very powerful and unscrupulous men, who at any time could command any number of witnesses and officials who would be ready to swear my life away.

I respectfully beg to state that I reached the Hungarian border on April 16, 1905, at Czacsa, Trenczen County, where I made a stop of twenty-four hours for the purpose of investigating the conditions existing with reference of handling emigrants to the United States by the representatives of both the Adria Steamship Company and the Fabrkarten Bureau, the licensed emigrant agents of the Kingdom of Hungary. I duly presented myself there by Mr. Bajan, the chief of said Bureau at Csacza, as a United States immigrant official, who told me that they knew about my coming and were expecting me for quite some time. Mr. Bajan was very anxious to know whither I was going from Csacza, and after having satisfied himself that my next stop will be at the city of Budapest, he sent a telegraphic message to a high official of the Royal Hungarian ministry of the interior, with whom Mr. Bajan told me he was in very close connection. I arrived at the city of Budapest in the evening of the 17th of April and immediately went to the Hotel Hungaria.

April 18 I spent in watching the various depots through which emigrants for the United States were bound to pass, and, engaging into conversations with several of them, I learned many interesting things, which were to lead me to the investigations with which I had been intrusted by the Commissioner General of Immigration, and which investigations necessitated frequent trips from Budapest to country places.

It took me but two or three days to get suspicious about the mail I received at the Hotel Hungaria, and my suspicion was particularly aroused by the fact that almost every letter which I received stuck to the envelope inside. I have reported my suspicions to Consul-General Chester and also to you, sir, and on May 2 in a letter which I sent by way of Berlin to the Commissioner-General of Immigration at Washington, D. C., and I attach herewith for such uses as you may see fit some evidence which will convince you beyond the shadow of a doubt that my mail was systematically opened, and I beg to state here most emphatically that about the opening of my mail at least one high official of the royal Hungarian ministry of the interior knew, and also at least four officials of the royal Hungarian state police, including two officials of very high rank. I also know positively that every one of my letters which I received was not only opened, but also copied and the copies sent to those higher officials who were so very anxious to know the contents of my mail.

I do not positively know the motives of these unlawful acts, but some of the local newspapers of Budapest state that certain high officials of the Royal Hungarian Government considered me a very undesirable visitor because I happen to have the qualification to discover things which they would not like to see published. I do not know how true or untrue this assertion is, but judging from my experiences of last year and of two years ago, and differentiating between the experiences of 1903 and 1904, the assertions made sound very plausible. As a matter of fact, in my last year's report to the Commissioner-General of Immigration, I stated that in 1903, and also at my arrival in 1904, I was received most cordially by the high officials of the Royal Hungarian ministry of the interior, but that after a certain report which I made to Washington had been published both in the United States and in Hungary I became persona no grata, and all kinds of veiled assertions were published in the press against the United States Bureau of Immigration in general and against myself in particular, all of which assertions culminated in the almost open charge that I was in the pay of the steamship trust, but more particularly in the pay of the German lines.

Besides the opening of my mail, which I established beyond the shadow of a doubt, I also established the fact that I was constantly shadowed by detectives, and I told you, at my last visit to Vienna, also of this fact; but I have also at least one witness for this shadowing in the person of Miss Lillian Ridat, whose affidavit I also submit herewith. From the attached copy of my report of May 2, to Commissioner-General Sargent and the copy of a letter of May 3, addressed to the private residence of Mr. F. H. Larned, the chief clerk of the Bureau of Immigration, at Washington, you may notice that I prepared a trap for the "gentleman" who committed the crime of opening my letters, which, according to the laws of all countries, international treaties, and also according to the laws of Hungary, is a felony, punishable by State prison. I do not know whether the trap would have succeeded or not, but when I caught in the afternoon of May 8 Detective Hugo Kalmar tampering with my hotel mail box, looking over the slip, cards, and messages that had been placed there, I thought that there was no necessity for any further evidence, and in my, what I believed to be justified indignation, I jumped at him, and in plain words told him that if I caught him again tampering with my mail box I would knock him down, although I was aware of the fact that he was a detective who had been shadowing me. Kalmar told me right then and there that he did not know me, that I must be suffering from "persecution mania," that he had never shadowed me, nor tampered with my mail box; that he was looking for his key, and as a proof that this was so he asked me for my name.

I publicly denounced both the detective and the hotel people for the outrage committed, and telegraphed to you. Now, what happens next. Fully thirty hours after the incident described above I am served with a summons to appear the next day at 10 o'clock in the morning before the police captain of the fourth district to answer to a charge of misdemeanor. After the receipt of this summons I called upon Consul-General Frank Dyer Chester, to whom I also had reported the incident of the day before, asking his advice, and he came to the conclusion that the best thing we could do was to call the next morning, prior to the hour set for my appearance at the fourth district, on Chief Rudnai. I do not know whether Mr. Chester has reported to you this interview, but I assure you that it drove the blood of shame and humiliation into my face. Mr. Rudnai spoke to the consul-general of the United States in a rather rude and disrespectful manner, denied any knowledge of any orders given to anybody to shadow me, and to open my mail, at the same time refusing, however, to call the chief of the detective bureau for the information desired by Mr. Chester.

On this occasion Mr. Rudnai told me also in a very sarcastic manner that only His Majesty could pardon me, to which I replied that I had not called to ask for any pardon, but that I took grateful notice of his statement that I was already convicted before trial. Mr. Rudnai suggested that I should consider myself very lucky that I had not been arrested immediately at the time when I insulted a member of the Royal state police force, a thing which surely would have happened if a Hungarian would have done the same thing in the United States. Mr. Rudnai also very frequently suggested that I should prefer charges against Detective Kalmar, but I refused to enter into that trap.

I asked Consul-General Chester to accompany me to the captain of the fourth district, where my trial was to take place, but he refused, and I attended the trial all alone. I first protested against the whole proceeding, but was overruled. Kalmar denied of having tampered with my mail or having ever shadowed me. I admitted the incriminating expression, "If I catch you tampering again with my mail, I'll knock you down, although I know that you are a detective." This would have not necessitated any further witnesses, but Kalmar insisted that the portier, the chief of reception, and the head waiter should be called. The three of them testified that they heard what I said, but not one of them saw Kalmar tamper with my mail. I was fined 50 crowns, which I paid under appeal and protest, and then started the official campaign against me, which I will prove to you personally was arranged and instigated by very high Government officials.

A few words now about my alleged bad record: I declare to you, sir, most solemnly and emphatically, that there is not a single black spot in my career. I have never committed any wrong; have never been charged before any court or magistrate with any crime, felony, or misdemeanor, and the alleged wrongdoings which are attributed to me were charged against me before no less a personage than President Roosevelt, and, to wit, in 1899, when he was governor of New York State. These charges were investigated and at that time by the then governor and dismissed as base slanders and libels. The fact that these libelous statements are brought up here convinces me, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the conspiracy against me was instigated by the Hungarian Government officials, because at that time they also emanated from the same sources, and, to wit, the Austro-Hungarian consulate-general of New York City.

In conclusion I beg to state that when I became a citizen of the United States, in the year 1897, I duly made application to the Hungarian Government to be released from the Hungarian State as its subject. I received the documents and they in themselves are prima facie evidence that there could have been no charge against me of any sort and that I did not even owe one florin taxes, because even for that they would refuse any Hungarian subject the release from the State subjugation. I further beg to invite your kind attention that ever since I have emigrated to the United States I have been eleven times in Budapest, now, for the third time, on official business, and formerly on business for American newspapers I had connections with. During my eleven visits I was in touch with Premier Ministers Wekerle, Banffy, Szell, and Tisza, and other officials, and on every one of my visits the local newspapers took due notice of my presence and wrote more or less complimentary articles about their patriotic fellow-Hungarian in America.

Therefore I respectfully submit that nobody had any right to look upon me as a suspicious person, and certainly nobody had any right to tamper with my mail.

Respectfully,

MARCUS BRAUN,
United States Immigrant Inspector,
Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

LONDON, June 13, 1905.

Hon. FRANK P. SARGENT,
Commissioner-General of Immigration,
Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In my letter, dated Hamburg, June 8, I reported to you the fact that since, under the instruction of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, I left the jurisdiction of Austria-Hungary, several apparently inspired newspaper articles appeared, which were of a very injurious nature to both my person and the mission to which you detailed me.

I referred particularly to a long article of the Vienna Deutsches Volksblatt of June 1, 1905, about which article I have since learned from positive and authoritative sources that it was inspired by the Vienna foreign office. I beg to submit said article herewith in a full and literal translation:

"THE MARCUS BRAUN AFFAIR.

"Yesterday Hungarian semi-official newspapers published an apparently inspired statement, in which it was stated that it was extremely wrong, on the part of a Hungarian police official, to enter into a newspaper polemic with an official of the American Government and attack his personal honor. The statement goes on to say that the official in question has been recalled from Hungary. We would be perfectly satisfied with this notice, which definitely takes the unimportant Marcus Braun affair to the diplomatic grave, and would not further bother about it were it not for the fact that on its surface are some symptomic characteristics. Characteristic with respect of the American Government in the way of selecting their officials, and characteristic of the Hungarian chauvinistic press' attitude when there are conflicts with foreign countries.

"Marcus Braun, a Hungarian Jew, who absconded from his native land in 1891 because there was an order of arrest out against him for swindling; who, in the same year, stole 70 marks from the Hungarian Aid Society, and who made this damage good only a few weeks ago, and who, according to the statements of one Horvath, stole from the latter furs, which theft he admitted. This Braun, who gained among the Americanized Hungarians of New York influence and position, and who at the governor's election of Mr. Roosevelt, and also at the Presidential elections of 1900 and 1904, delivered the naturalized Hungarian votes to the Republican party, was intrusted by his friend Roosevelt with the mission to study the conditions of emigration from central and eastern Europe, and to report about it. It is not surprising that this piece of news touched Hungary very unpleasantly. Braun had similar missions already in 1903 and 1904, and his reports contained veiled attacks against a Hungarian emigration policy. He was known from the beginning to be a sworn enemy of the agreement between the Hungarian Government and the Cunard Line, and he frequently openly expressed himself so. Whether the insinuation is true that Braun was bribed by the North Atlantic steamship trust, for the purpose of compromising the Cunard Line in the United States, and whether the deportation en masse of Hungarian citizens, who arrived from Fiume at New York, and there were not permitted to land, have been due to the lying suggestions of Braun, can not be positively established, because concrete proofs are lacking.

"But the mise en scene of his mission was sufficient ground for Budapest to be on the lookout. Braun's trip was not announced officially from America; he himself did not present himself at the Hungarian ministry and other authorities, and as soon as he arrived he gave out interviews containing rank lies and, among other things, praised Canada into heaven as the land where people should emigrate to.

"The Hungarian Government, instead of declaring most categorically at Washington that they would not tolerate in Hungary an individual against whom orders of arrests were out, and instead of protesting against the sending of a former Hungarian in an official mission, preferred to have Braun watched by the police. Detective Kalmar, who was intrusted with this, thought that it was also his duty to control Braun's mail and was caught in the act at the Hotel Hungaria. And now started the scandal. Braun complained to the police, to the American consul-general at Budapest, to the embassy at Vienna, to the Federal Government at Washington, and to the editors of the Budapest press. All papers of the 1848 Pary, and the Jew papers of this side of the Leitha took the persecuted Braun's part. The latter and Detective Kalmar diligently published interviews—Kalmar exposing Braun's past, who answered by threatening with American war vessels. The affair looked as if it would develop into an international conflict, when diplomacy took a hand, and, thanks to the correct and tact-showing behavior of the American ambassador, Mr. Bellamy Storer, a satisfying solution for both parties was found in the above-mentioned semiofficial statement.

"Now the quarrel is settled. Braun has left Hungary and probably will not so soon go there again. It is now timely to establish the responsibility for each and every one of the interested parties. That the Hungarian authorities have made a mistake has been stated already, but the procedure of the Washington Cabinet is also not beyond criticism. The sending of a naturalized foreigner into his native country on an official mission shows lack of tact. We only remind of the at that time much bespoken case of the Szech Consul Jonas, who, in the year 1895, was appointed American consul at Prague, but whom Count Kalnoky refused his exequator. It shows also lack of respect to send an individual with a tainted past on an official errand abroad. It being stated that Braun's record was submitted to a "commission of honor," and that only after having been exonerated by said commission he got his appointment. This may be true, but it will not be possible to spare that commission the reproach of lack of thoroughness, because a confidential inquiry at Vienna and Budapest would have been sufficient to establish the fact of orders of arrest being out. Finally, the mistake was made by the American Government not to notify officially the sending of Braun. The secret mis en scene of his mission must have so much more pained in Hungary, being that the Hungarian Government acts openly in questions of emigration and has nothing to conceal.

"While the action of the American Government is to be criticised, the attitude of the Hungarian press must be condemned. Out of sheer hatred against Count Tisza they made Braun a victim of police autocracy. They forgot that it was he who in 1902 started the fight against the flag which was sent by the Hungarian National Association. It was overlooked that Braun's ultimatum is to hurt the interests of Fiume; that he enticed to emigration to Canada. No credence was given to the detective about bench warrants, theft, and swindle, while Braun's insinuated threats about the appearance of an American man-of-war were accepted with great comfort. That an outbreak of a conflict with the United States would be suffered all over Hungary; that a diplomatic defeat of Count Tisza also means a humiliation of Hungary, seem to have been immaterial to those gentlemen, who always claim that they are the speaking tube of the will of the nation.

"We herewith take leave of Marcus Braun, and hope we never will hear of him again. It is said that he will go first to Berlin, and then, in pursuance of his mission to Russia and Roumania. We wish him bon voyage. May he, in the circles of Missler, Falck, and Ballin, think about it how he can make the powers at Washington believe that via Fiume only criminals like himself, while via Hamburg and Bremen only angels emigrate to America. For Russia and America [this is evidently a misprint, and should mean Roumania] we give him by all means the advice to show more tact than at Budapest. It may be that in St. Petersburg and Bucharest he will be received politely in spite of his antecedents. But these countries being less friendly to Jews, he runs the risk to be expelled at the least scandal, and perhaps meanwhile Mr. Roosevelt will have arrived at the conclusion that Braun is not worth the coals of a man-of-war."

This article is not only full of malicious libels and falsehoods, but it shows also stupidity. I will not arrogate myself the right to comment on those points as may relate to the doings or nondoings of the United States Government, but I believe it is not only my right, but also my duty to stand up and fight for my personal honor, which now for the past five weeks continuously is ruthlessly, maliciously, and without the slightest foundation, being assailed. I feel that I have to make a statement less my silence might be construed as an admission that I may have committed some wrong before emigrating to America, and that I now feel covered under the protection of American citizenship and the always convenient statute of limitation, which the laws of most countries guarantee, excepting in cases of murder and for the so-called "military crimes."

I beg to submit that I finished the compulsory military service of my native land in May, 1890. It took me fully two years of work before I could save enough money to go to America with, where I landed in June, 1892. Under the laws of Hungary I was still a soldier in the reserve, and the strict rules required that I could not leave without first obtaining permission from both the military and civil authorities of Hungary. I applied for such permission and obtained the same, which fact is duly entered in my military book, which is in my possession, in my desk at my New York residence.

Before permission is given to anyone to leave the country, particularly to leave for America, a diligent search is made by the police and civil authorities whether or not there is any process pending against the applicant, or whether there are any arrears for taxes. Now, can you conceive the idea that I would have received such permission were I under some charge at that time? But I go one step further, lest the idea may suggest itself that my alleged wrongdoings had been discovered after I had obtained my papers and left.

The rules of military men in the reserve require that whenever they go abroad they must report to the nearest Austro-Hungarian consulate of the place where they stay for more than two weeks. In obeyance of said rule, I reported within two weeks after my arrival in New York to the Austro-Hungarian consul-general of that city, which fact is also entered in my military book. Soon after my arrival at New York I accepted a position with the Frame manufacturing firm, of which Mr. Victor Wellisch, of 123 Second avenue, New York, was the manager, and who may be in a position to give information about my behavior, etc.

In October, 1892, I entered the services of the Austro-Hungarian Gazette, of which Mr. David Schnitzer, who at present resides at Chicago, Ill., was the publisher. In November of the same year Mr. Marcus Schnitzer, of 13 Park Row, New York, became part owner of the paper, and under his management I continued to work as reporter. At the end of December, 1892, I was engaged by Mr. Herman Alexander, at that time managing editor of the German Herald, also as a reporter. Mr. Alexander is at present the editor and publisher of Das Echo and the Plattdeutsche Post, both published in New York City. At that time I commenced also to work up local news items for English papers, such as the New York Herald, the New York World, and once in a while also for the New York Sun.

At about the end of April 1893, the New York German Herald sent me to Chicago as it special World's Fair correspondent. There I accepted also a position as press agent for the "Old Vienna" Company at the Midway Plaisance, and in August of the same year I became the correspondence of the German edition of the New York Journal.

In that capacity I exposed the crooked transactions of Dr. Anton von Palitschek, consul-general for Austria-Hungary at New York, and Austrian commissioner to the World's Columbian Exposition. Already at that time the Austro-Hungarian Government authorities were ransacking all the records of the world for the purpose to find some damaging evidence against me, whereby my exposures of their high official could be discredited. Their trouble was of no avail. The evidence I gathered against Dr. Anton von Palitschek was of such damaging nature, that the Vienna Government was compelled to recall him; he was subsequently arrested at Vienna, charged with embezzlement and other crimes, and was found guilty before a jury. But, being that the Austrian law requires at least two-thirds of the jurors for or against conviction, and in Palitschek's case the jury stood only seven for to five against conviction, he could not be sentenced and simply was dismissed from the Government service.

I continued in the service of Das Morgen Journal as reporter, and in April, 1894, I made my first trip to Europe. I was at least three weeks in Budapest, and duly reported to the authorities as prescribed by law, and this fact is also entered in my military book. During my stay at Budapest I interviewed the then prime minister of Hungary, Mr. Wekerle, to whom I was presented by Mr. Edward P. T. Hammond, United States consul at Budapest. The Hungarian newspapers at that time reported that fact fully, and there again the police failed to apprehend me if I were wanted, as it is being stated now by official statements from the Hungarian Government.

In June, 1895, the New York Journal and Das Morgen Journal sent me as special correspondent to the celebration connected with the opening of the Baltic Canal at Kiel, Germany. I was then newly married, and took my wife with me. After finishing my work in Germany I went with Mrs. Braun to Budapest, Hungary, and remained there till August of the same year. I again reported to the authorities, and it was again entered in my book. I had at that time also a long interview with the then Prime Minister Banffy, who was very anxious to find out all about the status of Hungarians in America, he having heard that I had started proceedings against the naturalization clerk of the supreme court of New York, because he refused to state on my "first papers" that I was a Hungarian, and insisted on putting me down as an Austrian. Premier Banffy and the entire Hungarian press praised me at that time sky high for having made such a patriotic fight for the recognition of Hungary in the United States.

In January, 1896, I started with the publication of a monthly magazine, printed in the English language, entitled the "Hungarian American." In the month of April, 1896, I was sent by the New York World to Budapest as special correspondent to the millennial celebration of Hungary. I remained in Budapest from April 20, 1896, till June 25 of the same year, again reported to the authorities, and have it entered in my military book, and at that time I had a "scrap" with the directors of the Millennial Exposition and the minister of commerce, because they refused to pay by services which I rendered as press agent for the exposition in America, and for which I held a contract from the Hungarian Government, given to me by the Austro-Hungarian consul at New York, Baron Leonhardi. I placed the matter in the hands of a Budapest lawyer. The Hungarian Government had me attacked in one of their official papers, but subsequently settled my claim out of court.

A libel suit which I brought at that time against the official organ of the government I withdrew upon the advice of my lawyer, because he informed me that Francis Stockinger, consul-general at New York, together with a lawyer by the name of Ignatius Weltner, John Nyiri, and a number of other persons, had sent statements about me to the court at Budapest, which on their face bore the stamp of fabrication and were absolutely illegal and inadmissible under the law, but my lawyer was afraid that the court under certain pressure might admit those statements and hearsay stories as evidence, and thereby lose my case. My lawyer concluded by saying that inasmuch as the Hungarian Government has settled my claim, thereby acknowledging that I was right, it was sufficient moral satisfaction for my not pressing the libel suit any further.

Having in the meantime, to wit, in June, 1897, become a citizen of the United States, and being aware that Consul-General Stockinger, with his satellites, continued to blackguard me, I wrote to the State Department at Washington, inquiring what remedy I, as an American citizen, would have against the Austro-Hungarian consul-general, who was conspiring against me, and who interfered with my constitutional right of making a living. The State Department wrote in answer that Mr. Stockinger was just as much subject to the laws of New York State as any other resident, whereupon I got a hold of him upon the street and told him in plain English words that if he was not going to stop his blackguardism I would either have him arrested or else give him a sound thrashing.

At that time I also made application to the Hungarian Government to be released from the bonds of that State, having become an American citizen. After a long wait, I believe in the month of January, 1898, I received documents dated Budapest, December 3, 1897, and consisting of transcripts from the civil, military, and criminal authorities of Hungary, stating that none of them had any claim against me—in other words, showing an absolutely clean record.

In 1899, and, to be more correct, in the month of May in that year, I, as president of the Hungarian Republican Club of the city of New York, arranged a banquet, to which the President, at that time governor of New York State, had accepted an invitation. A few days before the banquet Mr. Roosevelt received a letter from the aforementioned Ignatius Weltner, warning him not to go to that banquet because the man at the head of the organization giving the banquet, meaning me, was a fugitive from justice from Europe, a criminal, and general bad character. Governor Roosevelt found that letter somewhat peculiar, and had the charges contained therein investigated by Supreme Court Justice Blanchard, Capt. F. Norton Goddard, and Mr. George R. Manchester.

The accusations made by Weltner could not be substantiated by him, and referring the investigating committee to the Austro-Hungarian consulate, where Weltner claimed that the documents about my bad record could be inspected, the committee found from the then acting consul-general for Austria-Hungary, Mr. Freyersleben, that there was not an iota of truth in Mr. Weltner's statement. Consul-General Stockinger had in the meantime been recalled from New York on account of scandalous behavior at the time of the death of Empress Elizabeth, of Austria-Hungary, and it was I who committed that crime of exposing his behavior.

Governor Roosevelt attended the banquet, and then and there accepted an invitation for the banquet of the Hungarian Republican Club of the City of New York for the following year, and which he also attended.

In the years 1899, 1901, and 1902 I also visited Hungary. Of course I was persona ingrata with the powers of Vienna and Budapest, they having received so many reports from the consul-general of New York as to what a holy terror I am. The most unpardonable sin I could commit in the eyes of these people was the Americanizing of "their subjects" and "their colonies."

At this instance I desire to plead guilty to the only true charge contained in the above translated article of the Vienna Deutsches Volksblatt. I refer to the charge which says that it was me who, in 1902, made a fight against that Hungarian flag which was sent over for the purpose of keeping the Hungarians of the United States in loyalty to their fatherland. There was quite a turmoil about that flag, and upon the President's request I made a report about it, which report was transmitted by the President to the State Department, from where I received also a letter of thanks and acknowledgment. At this time the question seems opportune. From where did the Deutsches Volksblatt get the information about this flag affair, if not from official sources from Vienna? Or where from should they have known the affair of Consul Jonas, if not from the Vienna foreign office?

When, in March, 1903, I was appointed special immigrant inspector, official Austria-Hungary on both sides of the Atlantic tried to win me over. All kinds of inducements were offered to me to join organizations in New York which are under the protection of the Austro-Hungarian consul-general. I reported to you last year the fact how Messrs. Selley and Kaltenbrunn, the councilors of the ministeries of inte- Hungarian home at New York. During my official trip of 1903 I was received by Prime Minister Szell at Budapest and Prime Minister Koerber at Vienna. I had interviews lasting for hours with Messrs. Selley and Kaltenbrunn, the councilors of the ministries of interior of Austria and Hungary, respectively. Both gentlemen gave me evidences against steamship agents, which I used as exhibits in my report to you in the year 1903.

Last year I again called on both aforementioned gentlemen, and I had lengthy interviews not only with them, but also with Prime Minister Tisza. To my knowledge the American Government had neither in 1903 nor in 1904 officially apprised the Governments of Austria and Hungary of my mission, nor have these two Governments objected to my person because of a tainted past or because of the fact that I am a former Hungarian. I only became objectionable when in the performance of my sworn duty I reported facts to the Bureau which these Governments would have liked to be unknown. And now the silly diplomatic representation is made that my coming was not officially announced from America, and that a naturalized citizen of Hungarian birth ought not to be sent on official missions to Austria-Hungary.

As far as the silly charge is concerned that I have been bribed by the steamship companies of the North Atlantic trust, or by their agents, I can safely dismiss the same by simply pointing to my reports, which are in your possession, and for the refutation of the lying statements that I gave out interviews enticing to emigration to Canada, and God knows what else, I beg to attach hereto the only interview to which I consented and which appeared in the Budapest Magyar Hirlap and the Kivandorlasi Ertesito of April 30, 1905, and which was in answer to the following five questions:

"What is the purpose of your present trip?"

"Do the United States discriminate between emigrants from the various European countries?"

"Is the attitude of the immigration authorities alike toward all the steamship companies?"

"The newspapers wrote a good deal about proposed restrictive measures in the American immigration laws. What is true about it?"

"Would you recommend the Hungarians should emigrate to Canada in preference to the United States?"

The Kivandorlasi Ertesito printed my answer in Hungarian and in bad English, and from its contents you may see for yourself whether I said anything objectionable, except to such people who wanted to continue to dump the scum of humanity onto our country. All other reported interviews with me are falsehoods. Before the scandal became public at Budapest I only gave out the inclosed statement, and after that time I positively refused to make any other statement than that of having placed the entire matter into the hands of my Government, and consequently could say nothing for publication. It is true that any number of people called on me and of whom I know that they were sent for the purpose of getting me to say things which the Hungarian Government could use as a weapon against me, but I refused to enter into that trap.

There is one redeeming feature about the article of the Vienna Deutsches Volksblatt. The fact is acknowledged that I was shadowed by order of the Hungarian Government, and that my mail was tampered with. At the trial at which I was fined 50 crowns, Detective Kalmar most emphatically denied of ever having seen me before I attacked him, or of having tampered with my mail. Chief Rudnay, of the Budapest police, also made a statement to Consul-General Chester that never any orders had been issued to watch me. The day following, however, he gave out an official statement that I was an obnoxious foreigner, etc.

It seems that the Hungarian Government believes in the Latin saying "Semper aliquid haeret," or, in plain English words, "Just throw plenty of mud; something will stick." And there is no question about it that in those countries like Russia, Italy, Roumania, Greece, Montenegro, etc. I can not at present make any investigations without exposing myself to insults and official hindrances. After full satisfaction will be given for the insult, injury, and humiliation to which I was subjected, I can safely go to these countries, and therefore I beg to reiterate that my further stay in Europe is of little or no use for the time being, and once more earnestly and respectfully I ask for permission to return to America. I also beg to repeat that I am in ill health in consequence of the ordeal, and for the last five weeks I am under continuous medical treatment.

Respectfully,

MARCUS BRAUN.

NEW YORK, July 13, 1905.

His Excellency THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
Oyster Bay, N. Y.

MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing this memorandum upon the advice of Mr. Loeb, whom I saw twice since my return from Europe, and to whom I complained most bitterly about the outrageous way I have been treated abroad while doing my duty as an officer of this Government, and I still more bitterly complain about the way the American representative abroad and the Department of State at Washington have taken up my case, or rather, to correct myself, have disposed of it.

Mr. President, I have secured such an abundance of evidence and submitted the same to the Hon. Bellamy Storer, American ambassador at Vienna, Austria, that it would have been enough not only to obtain the most sweeping satisfaction for both the American Government and myself, but it positively would have been instrumental to ridicule the diplomacy of Austria-Hungary before the whole world. It seems, however, that the ambassador did not use the evidence I have submitted to him, but, on the contrary, must have made such reports to the Department of State at Washington that the said Department seemed to feel justified to consider my case as a closed incident, as I am informed in a letter, of which the following is a true copy:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 10, 1905.

MARCUS BRAUN, Esq.,
78 Second Avenue, New York, N. Y.

SIR: I have your letter of July 9, asking the "present status" of your case against the Hungarian Government, and I beg to inform you that, after reading the correspondence in relation to the matter, I find that it is considered by the Department as a closed incident.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HERBERT H. D. PEIRCE,
Third Assistant Secretary.

I have not seen the correspondence between the foreign office at Vienna, the American ambassador, and the State Department at Washington, but judging from the hilarious joy expressed by persons of this city who are in close connection with the Austro-Hungarian Government, I know this, that they claim a great diplomatic victory over the United States. If they actually did secure such a victory, Mr. President, then allow me to state that the American ambassador, and through him the Department of State, were deceived by the Austro-Hungarian Government in such a shameful manner that if universally known, our American diplomacy would be held up to the ridicule of the entire world.

I understand that Ambassador Storer reported to the State Department that while it was true that I was treated outrageously, yet it seems that the claim of the Austro-Hungarian Government is justified; that I had a bad record; that I showed lack of discretion; that I was an enemy to Hungary; that I was an agent for foreign steamship companies and that I joined with the deputies of the opposition party to embarrass and defeat the Hungarian Government. In addition to this, I understand that the claim was advanced that it was very unkind on the part of the American Government to send a native Hungarian who expatriated himself and became an American citizen, on a mission which was very embarrassing to the Hungarian Government.

As to the first charge, I respectfully invite attention to the inclosed copy of my statement sent to the Commissioner-General of Immigration, for the substantiation of which I hold official documents. This statement I also submitted to Ambassador Storer, but I understand it never reached the State Department.

Other documents were procured by Dr. Frank Dyer Chester, consul-general of the United States at Budapest, and were offered by him to Ambassador Storer, but the ambassador suggested that he should simply keep them in his safe at Budapest. Doctor Chester also offered to make an affidavit before the ambassador, setting forth an interview which he had with a state detective at Budapest, Hungary, and who solemnly declared before him that he had assisted the detective whom I caught tampering with my mail, in copying out my letters at police headquarters, and that the orders for that were given by the ministry of interior, and that all this was done for the purpose of making my further stay in Hungary as an investigator impossible. To this also the ambassador replied that it was not necessary and of very little use, since we were not in a position to disclose the identity of the official, because he would lose his position and possibly be punished besides for giving away state secrets.

I requested Consul-General Chester to make an independent report, with which request I believe he complied, but at the Bureau of Immigration at Washington I was told that nothing was heard, and therefore I take the liberty to inclose herewith for your perusal authenticated translations of certain documents issued by the Hungarian ministry of interior, by the royal criminal court of justice at Budapest, by the council of the capital and residence city of Budapest, and the ministry of national defense at Budapest. These documents were issued in 1897 upon my petition to be discharged from all further bondage of the Hungarian authorities at the time when I became a citizen of the United States, and on its face shows that I must have had an absolutely clean record in every respect, otherwise such documents could not have been issued. As a matter of fact, the Hungarian Government does not accuse me of having ever done anything wrong in my native land, but simply claim that I was a very bad man while abroad. In their official attacks made upon my character they stated, for instance, that I have been a curse to the Hungarians in America, that I blackguarded and blackmailed them, and that I stole from one Horvath, in New York, furs and a gold watch, between the years 1896 and 1898, and that a descent was made at my house and those goods seized on that occasion.

Another of my alleged misdoings is that I was the treasurer of the Hungarian Relief Society, at Munich, Germany, sometime between 1890 and 1891, and that I robbed that society to the aggregate amount of 70 marks (about $16.10), for which alleged crime they have nothing else to show but a letter. This ridiculous charge was made against me already nine years ago, and if I am not mistaken, was made also to you, Mr. President, in the spring of 1899, when you were kind enough, as governor of this State, to accept the invitation of the Hungarian Republican Club of New York to dine with us at the Café Boulevard. This charge emanated, as you will probably remember, also from the Austro-Hungarian Government, and was made by one Ignatius Weltner, attorney for the Austro-Hungarian consulate in New York.

I hope you will remember, Mr. President, that you had these charges investigated by the late Capt. F. Norton Goddard, Supreme Court Justice Blanchard, and one or two other gentlemen, who found this charge and all other charges made at the same time, to be false and not substantiated by anything. This ridiculous charge was brought up against me for the first time in 1896, when I had made a claim against the Hungarian Government for services rendered as press agent, and which was used at that time as an excuse why they should not pay me. At that time I sued the Hungarian Government, and my claim was subsequently settled out of court, but I took also precaution to procure from the Hungarian Relief Society, at Munich, a document, an authenticated translation of which I inclose herewith, showing that the accusation is nothing but a base slander. Still it seems that the American ambassador at Vienna accepted the statement of the foreign office at Vienna without asking for any proofs.

As far as the charge is concerned that I showed lack of discretion I have to say but so much—that for fully three weeks I was aware of the fact that my mail was constantly opened by the Hungarian Government, that a detective shadowed me at all times, and that I knew of the existence of a scheme to put up a job on me, and I never said a complaining word to anybody in that country, except to the consul-general at Budapest and the ambassador at Vienna, and only when I caught the state detective, Kalmar, red-handed, tampering with my mail, that I gave vent to my feelings. If that is lack of discretion, Mr. President, then I always want to be indiscreet.

The Hungarian Government tried all kinds of schemes to involve me into some trouble; they went even to the extent to try the badger game on me, by sending young women into my room at the Hotel Hungaria at Budapest, but I refused to bite. I was besieged day after day by newspaper men for statements, which I refused to make, and they were particularly anxious to get me to criticise the policies of the Hungarian Government, but all of which was of no avail. I was coaxed to visit the Opposition Deputies of the Hungarian Parliament, which I refused to do. I not even went to see Count Apponyi, whereas common courtesy would have required it that I should pay my respects to the distinguished statesman who is such a great friend of the United States, and who wrote to me such a beautiful letter on the occasion of the Hungarian Republican Club banquet on February 14, which you, Mr. President, graced by your presence.

As far as to the charge that I am an enemy of Hungary, I call upon your testimony, Mr. President. You have honored me quite often to talk to me about Hungary, Hungarians, and their affairs, and you will best know my feelings toward the country of my nativity, and, as far as the charge is concerned that I am an agent for steamship companies, I simply point to the various reports I have made since I am in the Government service. They show conclusively how much of an agent I must be for steamship companies.

Of course, it is not within my province to discuss that feature of the grievance of the Austro-Hungarian Government that it is unkind to send a native Hungarian on missions like the one I was sent, but, as a layman, I respectfully beg to submit that it would be a very unfortunate precedent for this country to sustain such objections. I did not go to Hungary in any diplomatic capacity. I look upon my mission as the work of an expert, whose duty it is to observe conditions and to report on them, but even admitting that the claim of the Austro-Hungarian Government was justified, why were not those objections raised two years ago, when I came to Hungary in the same capacity, and why were not those objections raised last year? And, if everything is admitted, if I really was an obnoxious man with a criminal record and all other bad things that are said about me—even then, according to my conception, the Austro-Hungarian Government was wrong in the extreme, because their business would have been to simply make a quiet protest to the American Government, and not enter into a conspiracy against a comparatively insignificant officer and thereby create a scandal.

In order to prove to you, Mr. President, that I was not always objectionable to the Government of my native country, I inclose herewith an authenticated translation from a letter of recommendation, signed in 1896 by Baron Leonhardi, the then Austro-Hungarian consul of New York, and I inclose also a printed envelope from the directors of the Millennial Exhibition of 1896 (gotten up by the Hungarian Government in celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of Hungary's existence as a State), and which will show that I was good enough for them at that time to propagate their affair in the United States; but I became obnoxious to the Hungarian Government soon thereafter, because it was reported to them that I was very successful in Americanizing the Hungarians sojourning in the United States, and that is a great crime in the eyes of the gentlemen who are not able to create conditions in their country that would enable people to make a living there. The greatest crime I committed, in the eyes of these people, is that I was fortunate enough to have you, Mr. President, recognize the American citizens of Hungarian birth, and honor them with your presence at the banquet.

I hope you will pardon this lengthy memoranda, but I feel that I owe that to myself, my family, and to my fellow-citizens that I should insist upon a complete vindication. My only stock in trade is my good name. I declare most solemnly, Mr. President, that I have never done, knowingly, anything wrong in my life. I always was a hard-working man, and I was always a very poor man. I am still hard working, and I am very far from being well off. Of course I have always known how to make my living, and to support my family, and as long as Providence will keep me in good health, I purpose to do the same thing. And therefore, Mr. President, I hope you will admit that I would not be worth my salt if I would not stand up and fight for my rights. I have been most outrageously subjected to the greatest indignities, and I appeal to you, Mr. President, that you should not allow this incident to be regarded as "closed," as I have been informed by your Department of State from Washington.

Respectfully,

MARCUS BRAUN,
78 Second avenue.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 26, 1906.

MARCUS BRAUN, Esq.,
78 Second avenue, New York City.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your memorandum or brief, dated the 21st ultimo, with reference to House Document No. 482, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, in the matter of Marcus Braun, and to say that it is the opinion of the Department, in view of all the circumstances of the case, that it would be inexpedient to reopen the question so elaborately discussed in your brief on file in the Department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

[Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I renew the amendment. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee what has been the result of the provision adopted two years ago for a purchasing agent at the Post-Office Department?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that office has been created, and that department is now in operation. Of course it will take some time to explain the extent of it. Provision is made in the latter part of this bill, which the gentleman will observe, putting that office under the head of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it true that he has done all of the purchasing for the Post-Office Department, as required by law?

Mr. OVERSTREET. As far as this bill is concerned, we make provision for all supplies that fall under the authority of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, except in those instances where, by reason of the peculiarity of the supply, it is particularly and exclusively limited to one particular department. The advertisement is had, and upon the requisitions of the various assistants the purchasing agent meets the requisitions as the service may find it necessary. In other words, the purchasing agency is operating successfully and satisfactorily.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am glad to hear it. I withdraw my formal amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I renew the amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making an inquiry. A few moments ago I asked the very able gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] a question about this St. Louis bank fraud order, and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] said that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] had introduced a bill on the subject, and I have the pleasure of seeing the gentleman in his seat. I hope he will take a few moments and explain the bill to the House.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I want to know what the motion was.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It was a formal amendment to get information from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who has introduced a bill relating to the subject of issuing fraud orders by the Post-Office Department, in this St. Louis bank matter. There is a bank in St. Louis that seemed to be perfectly solvent——

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, that bill, as I understand, is before the Committee on the Judiciary, but it has no relation to this bill under consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have had a great many inquiries about it. I never have seen it, and the gentleman from Indiana can explain it in a few moments, and I hope he will be allowed to do so. There are several preachers in my district who are stockholders in this bank.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman from Indiana can explain it to the gentleman from Tennessee, if he wishes, without taking up the time of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But there are other gentlemen here who want to know about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not in order for the gentleman to explain, as it is not germane to the bill. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $2,750 each; 6 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 15 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 15 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 10 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 95 inspectors, at $1,600 each; 18 inspectors, at $1,500 each; 78 inspectors, at $1,400 each; 25 inspectors, at $1,300 each; and 100 inspectors, at $1,200 each; in all, $578,100: Provided, That all persons employed on the 30th day of June, 1906, as superintendents of division, rural delivery, and inspector of agents, rural delivery, shall, on July 1, 1906, be appointed as post-office inspectors of the grade of $1,800 per year: And provided further, That all persons employed on June 30, 1906, as rural agents shall, on July 1, 1906, be appointed as post-office inspectors as of the same grade of salary which said persons were, on June 30, 1906, receiving as rural agents, except not to exceed 143 of such agents shall be so appointed as post-office inspectors.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 12, page 2——

Mr. JOHNSON. Before any amendment is offered, Mr. Chairman, I want to make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman, and offer it later.

Mr. JOHNSON. Having made the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask to reserve it in order to have an explanation from the chairman of the committee as to why the inspectors are consolidated.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina state his point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON. My point of order is that this is legislation; that they are legislating a whole class into office.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman reserves that point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON. I reserve it because I want an explanation of it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman's question, because I think the point of order will not properly lie, I will state that under the authority of law covering almost one hundred years, the Postmaster-General has clear authority for such arrangements within the jurisdiction of his Department as may seem best for its administration. Following the practice under such authority, from time to time changes are made under the direction, by special orders, of the Postmaster-General.

On the 1st of last December, and under this general statutory authority, the Postmaster-General made such changes in the organization as brought under the chief post-office inspector not only the post-office inspectors of the service, but the rural agents as well. There are, therefore, at this time under this reorganization two inspection services, both under a common head—that of the so-called "post-office inspectors" and that of the so-called "rural agents."

The general line of work of the post-office inspectors and their authority and salary have not been disturbed, except in one instance, which I will explain later. The merger is for the purpose of better administration, bringing under a common head the supervision of these two branches of inspection, and which are now under that head by reason of this special order of the Postmaster-General. That better administration will be an economy by reduction of the general expense of the two services. The other reason is to enlarge the power and authority of the rural agents. Under the law as at present operated, the rural agent is limited to the inspection of the rural route or the examination of territory with a view to the installation of rural service, or to slight changes incident to the growth of that service. The authority of the post-office inspector is not only to do as much as the rural agent is now permitted to do, but, as well, to inspect the accounts of postmasters of each of the several classes, and also to act as an officer of the Government in the investigation of depredations against the service or the postal system. If, therefore, under existing conditions, a rural agent happens to be at a certain office, his power would be restricted simply to the investigation of that rural service, and if the accounts of that postmaster needed inspection in regard to the bookkeeping, or if there had been some slight infraction of the law relative to depredations at a small post-office, the rural agent would not have authority to make this investigation, and it would be necessary to send for a post-office inspector for that purpose. It has been thought, therefore, that not only in the interest of better administration, but in the interest of economy, to merge these two services.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under existing law there is authority for 161 rural agents, but by reason of the fact that the service has been considerably extended there has not been found any necessity to continue so large a corps of such officials. The number now in the service, under existing law, of rural agents is 150 instead of 161. Therefore by merging these rural agents with post-office inspectors, clothing them with additional authority which is suggested, it would result in an economy to the administration of a little over $83,000. But, Mr. Chairman, it has been found from experience that the six division superintendents of rural delivery, those men who have operated at the six different points of the country in the superintendence of this service of rural extension, should be continued in the service by reason of their knowledge and experience rather than to legislate them out and put new men into their places for that particular purpose. Therefore the merger was made for the purpose of holding all of those individuals.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, under discussion of the point of order I did not think the gentleman would be confined to the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not discussing any point of order; the gentleman from South Carolina has simply reserved the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on with his explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if I have failed to cover any point that he desired to have explained?

Mr. JOHNSON. Under this merger the chief inspector of the Post-Office Department practically becomes the head of the rural free-delivery service, does he not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; he is now at the head of the rural agents, but he does not become the head of the service. The head of the service is first, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and under him comes the superintendent of rural delivery. The chief post-office inspector is now under existing law, under the operation of the administration of that service, at the head of the management of the rural agents.

Mr. JOHNSON. Just one other question? Is it not true that rural agents and post-office inspectors have been in the discharge of very different duties heretofore?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; not entirely. The post-office inspectors have a larger field of authority than rural agents. Whatever change is being made by this merger is to make the rural agents equal in authority with the post-office inspectors.

Mr. JOHNSON. But does not the gentleman make the men, whose chief business heretofore has been to detect crime against the post-office laws, rural agents, to do an entirely different kind of work, that they are not familiar with, and also make rural agents, who have heretofore been laying out routes, post-office inspectors, to search out evidences of crime?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. This merger changes in no respect whatever the duties or authority of the post-office inspectors. It makes no change with respect to that service at all, so far as their duties and authority are concerned. It does enlarge the duty and authority of the rural agent; but the gentleman will appreciate, I think, that any rural agent with sufficient ability and intelligence to go into a community for the purpose of laying out a rural route would be equally able to make an investigation of an ordinary depredation along that route, or would be equally able to make an ordinary routine inspection of the books of the fourth-class postmasters. It is for the purpose of avoiding duplication of expense, duplication of work, that we seek to make this merger; but not as the gentleman thought, for the purpose of extending the power and authority of post-office inspectors to perform rural-agent services. They have that power now, but the rural agent has not the other power.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I wish to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, a question. How many of these rural agents are there in the service of the Government at the present time?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The law to-day authorizes 161. One hundred and fifty are employed.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. And this bill provides for 143?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Six of these men are now division superintendents, and one is what is known under the present law as "inspector of agents," but it was intended to move to strike out that latter term from the bill and reduce the other to 142, because the inspector of agents, I understand, has been provided for in the legislative bill.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then, as I understand it, the 362 inspectors——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Three hundred and seventy-seven the total will finally make.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The 377 inspectors includes these 143 who are now called "rural agents?"

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir. Under this merger the rural agents are merged into a specific inspector organization at the same salaries which the rural agents are now employed at, while the six division superintendents, who are now receiving twenty-four hundred dollars a year and no per diem, are merged into that organization at a salary of eighteen hundred dollars a year with the ordinary per diem. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if the gentleman withdraws the point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point which I made in order to obtain this explanation for the House. I now desire to ask the gentleman one other question. Are any salaries increased in the section just read?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am glad the gentleman suggested it. I said a while ago I would explain it, but I had overlooked it. Under existing law, Mr. Chairman, there are fifteen post-office inspectors in charge throughout the country. Five of these inspectors are on a salary of $3,000 a year and ten are at a salary of twenty-five hundred dollars a year each. They perform similar services so far as responsibility and importance are concerned. We therefore make the fifteen at twenty-seven hundred and fifty dollars each in order to equalize the salaries where equal responsibility already exists.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is the first time in this Congress a committee has undertaken to equalize by lowering some and raising others.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are only five of them, and they have only been increased for one year. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my amendment. In line 12, page 2, strike out the language "and inspector of agents, rural delivery."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in page 2, line 12, by striking out the words "and inspector of agents, rural delivery."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I offer the following amendment: In line 21, page 2, strike out "forty-three" and insert "forty-two."

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, page 2, strike out "forty-three" and insert "forty-two."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "one hundred and," in line 21, page 2; so as to read "not to exceed forty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, strike out the words "one hundred and."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this bill, if it should be enacted into law, there will be 520 post-office inspectors traveling throughout the country, armed with royal warrants authorizing them to arrest any citizen whom they may suspect of having violated any postal law or regulation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe the gentleman wants to make a misstatement. There are not 520, but 377 provided for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a question of figures. I have added the several numbers in this section, including the 143 rural agents who are to be made inspectors, and it makes 520.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred and forty-three are already included in the 377 that are enumerated.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be, but in my judgment we have too many inspectors, considering the large power they have over the liberties and the rights of the people. There are already too many.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if you lessen the present combined force, you will restrict and hinder the extensions and supervision of the rural delivery service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I appreciate the fact that it is necessary to protect the mails against fraud and abuse, but we have a system of post-office inspection service that seems to me can not be defended upon any just and fair theory of administration. Post-office inspectors have the right, or at least they exercise the power, of arresting, fining, and collecting penalties from citizens of the country under a law or regulation that exists at this time. I read in a local paper, published in the district I have the honor to represent, a few days ago about an inspector from the city of Indianapolis—a man whom I know personally, a very excellent gentleman—who had gone to two ladies in a little village, who had sent the county paper to some friend, and had put some lead-pencil inscription on the margin. He went to their home and fined them $10 each, and collected it on the spot. The post-office inspector returned the money, I have no doubt, to the Government. I want to say, gentlemen of the committee, that that practice is going on all over the United States to-day. There is no question about it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that post-office inspectors collected, for some supposed offense, $10?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, of course. Is that news to the gentleman?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is, absolutely. I did not suppose they would do that sort of thing. It is not authorized by law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any law now in existence that permits a post-office inspector to exercise that kind of authority?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I assume there is; otherwise they would be guilty of criminal extortion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman from Indiana ought not to make any such statement as this unless he can cite the law. I state there is no such law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I say, I assume, Mr. Chairman, that there is a law or regulation of that kind or the officer would be guilty of criminal extortion, and I understand that it is a common practice for inspectors where there is a technical violation of law to say to the alleged criminal: "Now, you can pay so much to the Department"—the money goes to the Department doubtless, or the officers would not collect it—"you can pay so much to the Department and save yourself the trouble of being prosecuted before a United States commissioner or before the Federal courts."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if this suggestion of his, which I do not mean to dispute or affirm, is not directly a charge of robbery against the Post-Office Department? Is there any channel through which the money can ever reach the Post-Office Department without attracting their attention to the felonious manner in which the post-office inspector came by it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand there is a system of penalties imposed by the regulations of the Post-Office Department. The gentleman must remember that that Department has legislative, executive, and judicial powers combined. It exercises all the powers of the Government over the postal business of the country. It is not the fault of the Postmaster-General, but it is the law.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee. I saw him first.

Mr. PADGETT. I wanted to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I have in mind a concrete case where an inspector in the town of Columbia, Tenn., fined a citizen of that town $10 in each of seven cases—$10 for each offense. He proposed to arrest him, and the man said to him: "If you will not require me to be arrested I will pay $10 in each case," which he did.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think there is no question about the practice, and I assume that it is authorized by law. The Internal-Revenue Service is conducted on the same plan. A deputy collector may impose a penalty of 50 per cent or a certain other per cent of the amount of a special tax if it is not paid on the day it is due, and collect the penalty. That is a common practice. The amount thus collected is turned in and accounted for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question in that connection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If it is simply a question. I have some views that I want to submit to the committee on this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Those penalties you speak of which are collected by deputy commissioners of internal revenue are imposed by law, are they not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I assume they are, of course, and I assume that the others are.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman know that if the taxes are not paid by a certain date a penalty per cent is added and collected?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The criticism that I am making is of the law and not of the officers, because I assume that they are performing their duties in accordance with the postal regulations or the law. I do not know which it is; possibly it may be both.

Now, I think inspectors are clothed with too much power, or there are too many of them. There are 520 of these secret emissaries who go about the country looking after the business of the Post-Office Department, and incidentally, by dark-lantern methods, make inquiries into the reputation and the business carried on by every citizen, every association, and every corporation throughout the land. Who knows how many secret reports that may reflect upon the character of individuals, associations, or business concerns are now sleeping in the archives of the Post-Office Department that have never come to light, put there by confidential reports of those emissaries? And when I speak of them as emissaries I do not mean it in an offensive sense. There is a system of postal espionage in this country that is absolutely inconsistent with the spirit of free institutions, and it is not what should be expected in a land of law and liberty.

Post-office inspectors may lodge complaints with the Postmaster-General that the business of an individual is fraudulent. The Postmaster-General may be satisfied from the secret reports of the inspectors that there are some irregularities in the character of the business the particular individual is conducting, and he may peremptorily enter a fraud order and withhold from that individual the privileges of the mails, absolutely ruining his business and blasting forever his business reputation. When that citizen calls upon the Postmaster-General, asking permission to see the charges that have been made against him, he is informed that they are confidential and is refused the privilege.

Now, something was said a few minutes ago about the People's United States Bank, at St. Louis, Mo. That institution became a victim of the post-office inspectors. A fraud order was issued against the institution about six months ago, and it was put into the hands of a receiver as an insolvent corporation after the fraud order was issued, at the suit of the secretary of state of the State of Missouri. Administered by a receiver, the institution paid every depositor a hundred cents on the dollar. It has already repaid to the stockholders 92½ per cent of the par value of their stock, and it has an abundance to pay the balance; and last week the supreme court of the State of Missouri decided that the order appointing a receiver and adjudging the bank insolvent was improperly issued in the first place; that it never was an insolvent institution; but what good does that do?

The mandate of the court ordered the receiver discharged and the affairs of the bank turned over to the company, but there stands the fraud order against the institution and against its president in the Post-Office Department, and they can not conduct any business in the way of correspondence and nothing but ruination is their fate. The president of the bank applied to a Federal court for a review of the fraud order and for a mandate against the Postmaster-General compelling him to restore to the bank the privilege of the mails. That court decided that the right to the mails was not a vested right and the discretion of withholding the privileges of the mails for fraud was vested in the Postmaster-General and was not subject to review by any court.

I do not know what may be the merits of that case, but some time ago I introduced a resolution in the House and had it referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, the gentleman must state the facts if he hopes that the committee will consider them at all. No such resolution as that ever came from the gentleman to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It went to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, requiring the Postmaster-General to report to the House the facts upon which he issued the fraud order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true. I thought the gentleman referred to the bill spoken of by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The resolution is the one I had in mind. The Committee on Post-Offices reported the resolution back to the House and it was adopted, and a week or ten days ago the Postmaster-General courteously informed the House that it would not be compatible with the public interest to give the House or the country the information upon which that important order was issued. That bank never has known, and probably never will know, upon what evidence the Postmaster-General made the order ruining its business and wrecking its prospects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think it is due to the committee to understand that 99½ per cent of the argument of the gentleman from Indiana has been directed to matters entirely foreign to this bill. I think it is unfair for him to leave the impression and seek to prejudice the committee against a bill by a tirade against the Post-office Department on matters that have nothing to do with this committee.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported the gentleman's resolution without the change of a syllable, and it is not worthy, it is not deserving, of the criticism of the gentleman from Indiana. The fraud order belongs to another committee, is the result of another law, and not to the items contained in this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just a moment. I did not interrupt the gentleman. Now, the fraud order is authorized by a statute that has been on the books for almost a generation, and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has nothing to do with it. This bill contains nothing relating to that statute. The criticism by the gentleman from Indiana against the espionage of the post-office inspectors as a basis for fraud orders is not a proper argument to sustain his amendment. That is what I am interested in. We have been debating under general debate for almost ten days nearly every conceivable subject, and now when we get to the bill itself it is left for the gentleman from Indiana to raise some extraneous subject which will probably prejudice the mind of somebody to attack this particular provision of the bill.

There is no law on the statute book, and I challenge the gentleman to cite a single one, bearing out his claim that the post-office inspector has authority or the right to assess a fine or to put anybody under arrest.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is in the post-office regulations.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The post-office regulations do not authorize it either.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Indiana has challenged me, and I want to state that post-office inspectors do have authority to make arrests. They perform regular detective service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The post-office inspector merely carries out the instructions of the Postmaster-General in investigation, and he does no conclude that investigation, but it is left for the Postmaster-General or the proper official of the Department to pass upon his report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have provided here for no additional post-office inspectors. We have provided here for no increase of salary, except such as I have named, but we have sought to give the advantage to these rural agents, clothe them with equal authority. The gentleman gives his figures as to the number of post-office inspectors, which I am sure is at least 50 per cent from the facts, and almost 100 per cent. I can not be expected to fight against imaginary accusations. We have stated here all the facts. We provide for the merger of these post-office inspectors authorized by law with the rural agents now in the service, and the gentleman moves to strike out 100 of these rural agents. I do not believe this committee, nor this House, and I do not believe the gentleman's constituents, will approve his striking out 100 rural agents. That is what his amendment amounts to. The amendment is to strike out the merger of 100 rural agents, which would mean their elimination from the service. Whatever may have been in the gentleman's mind, that will be the result of his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Whose amendment is it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] moves to strike out 100 agents and leave 42. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire a minute to state to my colleague that I made no criticism of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I think in that assertion this committee will bear me out. I have made no reflection on the committee. I was making a criticism about the law, not even against the Post-Office Department, but the law under which some indefensible practices are going on.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the amendment have anything to do with that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; it has this to do with it: It takes from the list of post-office inspectors who go about with these lettres de cachet in their pockets—it reduces their number by 100.

Now, in regard to my amendment, I expected when I had an opportunity to withdraw it. I wanted an opportunity to say something to the House on the fraud-order question and the practice that is going on over the country in the hope that it might possibly result in some wholesome legislation, not from the Post-Office Committee, because legislation of that kind should come from the Committee on Judiciary. The gentleman was a little bit too sensitive, I think, when he took to himself and his committee some of the criticisms I intended for the law and for the whole Congress, and not for the gentleman at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then you admit your amendment does not seek to correct any of the things you desire to correct by that amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not unless you strike out all the post-office inspectors. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] No objection is heard.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 11, after the word "each," strike out "six" and insert "ten."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear that amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I can not agree to that, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I desire to make this inquiry as to whether or not the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads had any hearings before that committee upon the different items in this bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Most assuredly, Mr. Chairman, upon all the items.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That was my impression. I want to follow that by another question. I want to know why it is impossible for a Member of this House at this time to have access to a copy of those hearings?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, Mr. Chairman, I can only say the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, like all other committees of the House, has a very limited authority in the way of printing. We printed all the copies that we felt we had authority to print and gave them out just as fast as Members inquired for them.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. How many copies were printed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. One hundred, I understand. We have general authority to print, which is only for the use of the committee, and we have very generously exhausted our entire supply by giving them to Members as fast as we had demands for the copies.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does not the custom prevail with other committees, with the authority they already have or by distinct authority secured from the House, to print a sufficient number of copies to give at least each Member of the House who wishes one a copy?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not so understand.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. So that those Members may ascertain what these hearings are?

Mr. OVERSTREET. My understanding is the committees of the House authorized to hold hearings are permitted to print a limited number of copies of the hearings for the use of the committee, and that number is usually a very limited number. There has certainly been no disposition on the part of the committee to decline to give out copies of the hearings, and we have given all they have I am informed.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. There are only about eighteen members of the committee. Then, according to the gentleman's position, it was necessary to have only eighteen copies printed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, if we limited it, logically that would be the result, but it costs a little more to print a hundred than it costs to print eighteen, and it costs much more to print 500.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would have been much better to have had 500 copies printed in order that every Member of this House might have an opportunity to know something about what is contained in this bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, under the law a copy must be furnished to the Library. You will find a copy there, and the law does not provide for as many copies of the statute as there are Members of the House. I would ask the gentleman if he has inquired at the Library?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I did not inquire at the Library, but I made divers and sundry inquiries elsewhere without success.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am very sorry the gentleman was unable to secure a copy.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does not the gentleman think if he had made the effort that the House would have given him the permission to have had the additional number printed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, anybody could have objected to it. Why did not you ask for it? This is the first time the gentleman has ever called my personal attention to it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. But it is not the first time I have called the attention of members of the committee to it, because I have earnestly sought for two or three weeks to get possession of one of these precious documents containing the hearings before the committee over which the gentleman presides.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest the gentleman can still ask for that in the House. Perhaps the gentleman will realize he is quite as much at fault as anybody else.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. No; I do not realize it; I do not admit it, because that was a matter peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. If these hearings are of any value to the committee, they would be, Mr. Chairman, of value to this House. There is more reason why the Members of this House should have the hearings than the members of the committee, because the members of the committee are situated so that they can be present and get the benefit of the hearings at the time they are had before the committee, but the only way by which the Members of this House can secure any information as to what is contained in this bill is through these hearings here in the House, and with almost four hundred Members only 100 copies of these important hearings are printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem, and of inspectors in charge, expenses incurred by field inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, and traveling expenses of the chief post-office inspector, $70,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 3 I desire to offer an amendment. Page 3, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "and traveling expenses of the Chief Post-Office Inspector."

When the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was before this House on the 29th of March, I interrogated the chairman of the committee, or the gentleman having charge of the bill [Mr. LITTAUER], and inquired of him why the salary of the Chief Inspector had been increased in that bill. You will find on page 4584 that the gentleman in charge of the bill explained that it was a very responsible position, that the chief inspector resided in Washington, and that he received no per diem allowance or traveling expenses, and for that reason the Committee on Appropriations increased his salary $500 in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me, do I understood the gentleman to say that the record shows, from a statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the increase of salary of the Chief Post-Office Inspector was because he received nothing for traveling expenses? If that is true, I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will read what the gentleman told me in answer to my question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I simply want to get the record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON (reading)—

> Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any increase in salaries?
> Mr. LITTAUER. The Chief Inspector's salary is increased.
> Mr. JOHNSON. What was the reason for increasing his salary?

Then the colloquy proceeded. He was speaking about the salaries of other people, and I said the only way to equalize was to equalize up, and then Mr. TAWNEY said:

> He resides here in Washington, is located here in the Department, and receives no per diem allowance whatever. He gets nothing but straight salary, while the other inspectors have per diem and traveling expenses in addition to their salary.

Upon that statement this House increased his salary $500. That increase having been made for that reason, I propose to strike from this bill the provision for traveling expenses.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this committee has no jurisdiction over the Chief Post-Office Inspector, and has nothing to do with the increase of his salary, if such increase has been made. The fact is, however, he has headquarters in the city of Washington, and must necessarily, in the discharge of his general duties, at various times during the year travel from his headquarters. He does not receive any per diem, but has a straight salary. Now, the record which the gentleman has just read did not, if I correctly understood it, make any suggestion about his traveling expenses. He says he receives no per diem. That record, unless I failed to hear it aright, did not state that he did not receive any traveling expenses; therefore I think the amendment ought to be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, will the gentleman let me read it again?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is from Mr. TAWNEY, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on page 4472 of the RECORD of March 29. Referring to the Chief Inspector, he said:

> He resides here in Washington, is located here in the Department, and receives no per diem allowance whatever. He gets nothing but straight salary, while the other inspectors have per diem and traveling expenses in addition to their salary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to take exception to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations just referred to. All inspectors do not get per diem and traveling expenses. The fact yet remains that record does not state that the Chief Post-Office Inspector gets "no traveling expenses." It said he got no per diem. We are making no provision for per diem, and only provision for such traveling expenses on official duty while away from his home, his domicile, and his official headquarters. I think the amendment of the gentleman ought to be voted down.

Mr. HULL. Are not the per diem expenses allowed to the other inspectors intended for traveling expenses? Is not that a fact, whether you call it traveling expenses or per diem expenses? Is it not really the same thing?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That has been regarded substantially as a substitute.

Mr. HULL. In the one case they are limited, so that the amount can not exceed $4 a day, while in the other case if their expenses are more, they are allowed for. Is not that the only difference?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No matter what the difference is, in respect to this particular officer, he receives no per diem, but should receive his actual expenses when traveling away from his home, his official headquarters, and his domicile. That is all this provides. Now, we have nothing to do with the increase of the salary. I do not know whether it is meritorious or not. I was not on the floor at the time that subject was under consideration, as referred to by the gentleman. I only know this, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the necessities of good administration the Chief Post-Office Inspector is obliged at times to leave his headquarters, in strict obedience to the necessities of the administration, and when he does, his actual expenses should be provided for. That is all this provision seeks to do.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If this language does not mean that the Chief Inspector received no traveling expenses heretofore, I should like to know what it does mean.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I said a moment ago that I could not accept that statement, even though it were made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because, as a matter of fact, I know he has received traveling expenses. This is identically the same language as the existing law, so that if that statement was made, it was a mistaken statement.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. So that if the committee in that case was led to increasing the salary of this inspector upon the theory that he received no traveling expenses, they did so under a misapprehension.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think so.

Mr. LACEY. I move to strike out the last word. I do it for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I notice on page 2 that the inspectors are rated at from $2,250 down as low as $1,200. Then it further provides that they may be allowed, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, not to exceed $4 per day as a per diem allowance when out on the road and engaged in the performance of their duties.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Those who receive less than $2,000 get that per diem allowance when out on duty.

Mr. LACEY. That is what I was coming to. Now, it provides that the man who draws over $2,000 a year shall not have a per diem, so that what I want to know is this: A post-office inspector drawing $1,800 a year is allowed by the Department $4 a day per diem in addition to that, making his income over and above his traveling expenses amount, perhaps, to $2,600 or $2,800 a year, while the $2,000 man can not draw the per diem at all, apparently, on the face of this bill. Now, what is the reason for that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is perfectly simple, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. LACEY. That is what I wish to know.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The men who are receiving salaries of $2,000 and upward are stationed at fixed points.

Mr. LACEY. All of them.

Mr. OVERSTREET. All of them. Of course, from time to time it becomes necessary for them to go away, when conducting investigations and matters of that sort.

Mr. LACEY. When they are ordered away, should they not have their per diem?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They get their actual traveling expenses then.

Mr. LACEY. The others get their expenses and per diem both?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; not at all. They only get the per diem in lieu of all of their expenses.

Mr. LACEY. Including their traveling fare?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I think not.

Mr. OVERSTREET. They are allowed to ride free on trains that carry postal cars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask if the traveling expenses of the Chief Inspector include his hotel bills and all of his expenses?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, certainly; his actual expenses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The upshot of the thing is, then, taking this bill in connection with the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, that we increase the salary of this man because he gets no per diem.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I said a while ago that I did not want to be bound by the reasons given in that debate for the increase in the salary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will put it another way, then.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We are simply providing here as we always have provided, and, in my judgment, always should provide, for the actual traveling expenses of this official when he is away on official business.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The upshot of these two bills is this, that for some reason—as far as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] is concerned, he says it was in lieu of per diem; it may have been for some other reason on the part of other gentlemen—but for some reason this man's salary was increased $500 per year in the other bill. Now it is increased by the sum total of whatever his traveling expenses may be. So that you have two increases for the same man at the same time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the expense would be in the interest of the Government upon whose official business he happened to be called. He has been receiving it all the time. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then an inspector who lives in Washington is financially better off while away from home if his expenses are paid than he is while staying at home?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON) there were—ayes 25, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For compensation to postmasters, $24,000,000.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say that there are men who have responsible and quasi official duties to perform and for whom I see no provision in this bill. I refer to the post-office referees in the Southern States. [Laughter.] I would like to ask the chairman of the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee whether this bill carries any salary or compensation for those referees?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will state to the gentleman that my district is included in the referee schedule. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIXEY. I had heard that possibly the gentleman's district was included and treated as southern territory. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I can possibly best illustrate the objections to the present system of appointment of postmasters and establishment of post-offices by reference to my own district as an example. Something over twelve months ago the Post-Office Department appointed three gentlemen in the Eighth district of Virginia for the purpose of recommending persons to be appointed to fourth-class offices. To these three gentlemen were referred all applications and petitions for appointments as postmasters in the fourth-class offices. To them were also referred petitions for the establishment of new post-offices. These three gentlemen lived in different parts of the district. They divided up the territory among themselves and persons who were applicants for postmasters had to go to the referee in whose territory the county happened to be for recommendation for appointment to offices.

Mr. BYRD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. Did the Member of Congress have anything to do with the appointment of the referees?

Mr. RIXEY. The Member of Congress had nothing to do with the appointment of the referees or the appointment of the postmasters. I am not complaining that I am not consulted about the appointment of postmasters; I do not ask it, but I do insist that when the people in my district want a post-office established, or a postmaster appointed, I have a right to go to the Department here in Washington for that information, and not to be told, as I am told frequently, that the matter has been referred to the post-office referees—gentlemen who are irresponsible, so far as their official connection with the Department is concerned. These referees decide who shall be the postmaster and where the post-office shall be located, of course subject to the approval of the Department, which is generally given as a matter of course. It would not like to turn down its assistants who serve without pay.

This condition of affairs should be changed. It is not right that people from my district, who come here to interview the Department on this subject, should be unable to secure any information until this referee—assistant to the First Assistant Postmaster-General—makes his report. Instead of being able to obtain information at the Department, I have been compelled to tell some of my constituents to go and see the referee, and get his indorsement. These referees were appointed something over twelve months ago. One has since been made collector of internal revenue and moved his office to the city of Richmond, another has since been appointed a clerk in the Pension Bureau, and the third one, and not an officeholder, has resigned. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do insist that the Post-Office Department, when I come with the recommendation for the establishment of a post-office, shall not refer me to the pension clerk here in Washington, or refer me to the gentleman who holds a Federal office in the city of Richmond, or tell me to wait until these gentlemen report. Why should not the patrons of the office be consulted? The system of appointment of postmasters and location of post-offices by referees—who are generally either Federal officeholders or aspirants for some office—is a disgrace to this Government, and is a positive proof of the incapacity of the Post-Office Department. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of this matter, should change the rules of that Department, or, if he can not administer his office, should resign, or this House should cut down the compensation that he receives. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices: Two, at $3,500 each; 25, at $3,000 each; 5, at $2,500 each; 2, at $2,000 each; 12, at $1,900 each; 20, at $1,800 each; 55, at $1,700 each; 100, at $1,600 each; 90, at $1,500 each; 100, at $1,400 each; 210, at $1,300 each; 350, at $1,200 each; 340, at $1,100 each; 250, at $1,000 each; 60, at $900 each; 60, at $800 each, and 60, at $700 each; in all, $2,123,800.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 23, page 4, after the word "all," to insert "not to exceed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 23, after the word "all," insert "not to exceed."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, strike out "thirty-five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "four thousand."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is contrary to existing law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a minute and a half?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably if the point of order is pressed, it is good; but I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that every assistant postmaster in the whole United States is paid on a schedule which is identical, except those in Chicago and New York, and that schedule provides that they shall be paid at the rate of 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster. Those in Chicago and New York, with all the duties that they have, are not paid as well as the men in other cities, and I think that injustice ought to be corrected. If this amendment were adopted it would correct it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—the Post-Office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order upon the bill.

LAWS IN RELATION TO THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 12872.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12872) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and codify the laws relating to municipal corporations in the district of Alaska," approved April 28, 1904.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to amend and codify the laws relating to municipal corporations in the district of Alaska," approved April 28, 1904, be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding at the end of section 2 thereof the following:

"Provided, That any town heretofore or hereafter incorporated in the district of Alaska may extend or otherwise modify its boundaries in the manner hereinafter provided. A petition praying for such extension or modification shall first be presented to the judge of the United States district court presiding over the court in the judicial division in which the town is located, which petition shall be signed by at least sixty qualified voters of said town and shall specify the existing boundaries, as well as the proposed new boundaries of such town, the number of inhabitants thereof, and such other facts as may tend to show good ground for such extension or modification of boundaries. The judge shall thereupon, by an order, fix a time and place for considering said petition, which time shall not be less than thirty days after the date of such order. A printed or typewritten copy of said order shall be posted in three of the most public places in said town at least thirty days prior to the time fixed for considering said petition. At the time and place fixed for considering said petition the judge shall give a reasonable hearing to those who are in favor of and to those who are opposed to the same; and if he is satisfied that it is for the best interest and welfare of the people of such town for the boundaries thereof to be changed, he shall, by an order, so adjudge. He shall also, by said order, specify the changes which he deems necessary in the boundaries, and direct that at the time of holding the next annual election in said town, or sooner, if deemed necessary, an election be held, by separate ballot, as prescribed in the case of an original incorporation, to determine whether the people of such town desire the boundaries thereof changed. A printed or typewritten copy of said order shall be posted at three of the most public places within said town at least thirty days prior to the day of election. Every person qualified as an elector in said town shall be qualified to vote upon the question of the proposed change of boundaries thereof. Said election shall be held under the charge of the officers of the town appointed for the purpose of holding elections; and all proceedings subsequent to such election, down to the entry of the order of the judge making such change of boundaries, shall be the same, so far as may be, as the proceedings upon the original incorporation of a town."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to move to amend by striking out the second section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives notice in case the bill is considered he will move to strike out the second section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does section 2 do?

Mr. HOGG. It contains a provision for a reversion of the property back to the Government in case they cease to use it. That was done when the original bill did not provide for the payment to the Government of this dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. This amendment which has been suggested by the committee charges them a dollar and a quarter an acre, which is the Government price, and this amendment obviates the necessity for that provision. They have to pay for the land at the Government price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that all the land is worth?

Mr. HOGG. It is not worth that for any other purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. HOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there a lawsuit now between the State of Kansas and Colorado affecting the use of the waters of this river?

Mr. HOGG. No; this water flows into the Gulf of California, in the western portion of the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is the other river?

Mr. HOGG. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOGG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I have another bill—H. R. 10292.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if this is the request for unanimous consent, I will be forced to object.

Mr. HOGG. It is very short.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps at some other time I might not object to it, but I object now.

CONDITIONS IN THE KONGO FREE STATE.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial from the Kongo Reform Association, a very large, intelligent, and powerful body of men. I am not quite sure but that the President of the Senate several days ago presented a similar memorial. I now present it with the request that it be inserted in the RECORD, and also that it be printed as a document. I do not care to detain the Senate by having it read, because Senators, I think, will read it with great interest, and the reading at this moment would produce no impression upon the country.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

In pursuance of the end sought in memorials heretofore addressed to you in the interest of the people of the Kongo State by members of our association in many parts of the country we would most respectfully ask your attention to the following statements:

We have learned with satisfaction that the State Department, while recognizing that our Government does not share the powers of the Berlin signatories, is prepared to give careful consideration to all information regarding conditions in the Kongo State, and to any suggestions that may be offered as to forms of action believed to be open to our Government.

NEW MISSIONARY TESTIMONY.

As respects the facts of the situation, we beg to submit to you the inclosed documents, one of which (Document A) contains the signature of fifty-two missionaries, being a unanimous expression by a conference held at Kinchassa (Stanley Pool), Africa, January 11, 1906, which was representative of six nationalities and of six well-known organizations engaged in mission work in the Kongo State. Of these missionaries, nineteen are connected with American missionary societies.

We would particularly call your attention to the following paragraphs in this document:

"We had hoped when we last met two years ago that some amelioration of the unhappy condition of things existing would be effected, but we profoundly regret to state that in many parts of the land this condition is still unaltered.

"We have never been other than loyal to the State, and have borne this and other grievances, which we would have more strongly protested against but that we hoped they were only a passing phase of affairs.

"We have no object in view but that of the interests of humanity and the desire that the natives shall not be caused to disappear from off the face of the earth. And so we would utter again our solemn protest against the terrible state of affairs still existing in the Kongo State, and we appeal in the name of justice, liberty, and humanity to those who value these blessings to help in every lawful way to secure them for all the Kongo peoples."

FINDINGS OF THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

The second document (Document B) presents citations made from the report to King Leopold by the commission of inquiry appointed by him. The selections herein made from this report present passages relating to the condition of the native people. It appears to us that these passages should be viewed independently of other points treated in the report of the commission. Whether the wholesale defeat of the aims in view in the recognition of the Kongo State is excusable because of adverse conditions; whether the enterprise of the State in the construction of public works counterbalances the oppression, enslavement, and threatened extermination of the people; whether any alleged improvement in conditions is permanent, and extends beyond the little section visited in the vast territory; whether laws upon the statute books have been sincere, or otherwise; whether the reforms suggested are adequate and properly guaranteed; whether the present system of enforced labor is justified and must be continued; all these, we believe, are questions for consideration by a responsible tribunal, and should not be confused with the one vital question now at issue, the condition of the people under the rule of the Kongo government.

THE TESTIMONY HEARD BY THE COMMISSION.

The third document (Document C) is submitted with a view to remedying a grave defect in the report of the commission of inquiry. The Kongo government has failed to make accessible to the public, and to other governments, the evidence presented at its hearings. It seems to us that this course, which would not be tolerated in any civilized country in a case of importance, is the more to be regretted in this instance in view of the ex parte character of the commission's appointment, and the gravity of the interests affected. We would respectfully urge that the publication of this evidence by the Kongo government shall be requested by you. As a provisional substitute for such publication, we present the statements of witnesses in the accompanying document. The fact that their authors declare these statements to be a reproduction of records of the commission now on file at Brussels—a representation which may at once be disproved if it is unreliable—gives us additional confidence in calling your attention to the shocking disclosures thus made.

INTERNATIONAL ACTION A NECESSITY.

With reference to the condition thus disclosed, we would respectfully urge that international action is a necessity. The Kongo Government evidently is disqualified for dealing satisfactorily with the existing situation, in view of its alleged responsibility for the wrongs reported, and of its acknowledged commitment to maintenance of the system of territorial monopolization to which it is declared these wrongs are directly traceable.

As respects the procedure to be chosen by our Government in promoting the desired international action, it is obviously unfitting that we should attempt decision, yet, in view of the expression made to us by the State Department, we beg leave to offer the following suggestions:

RELATION OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT TO THE BERLIN SIGNATORIES.

We would respectfully call your attention to the fact that, while it is plain our Government does not share the supervisory powers belonging to the signatories of the general act of the Berlin conference, it is equally clear that our Government is not to be regarded as having cut itself aloof from the body composing the conference at Berlin; for, when this body, five years after its meeting at Berlin, was reconvened at Brussels, the United States Government, by virtue of its original relations to the issues under consideration and its presence and influence at Berlin, was invited to participate in the conference; and, while careful to avoid any form of action implying full ratification of the Berlin act, our representatives, in response to the urgent request of their associates, and under cabled advice from the United States Government, were full participants in the action taken. We would, therefore, urge that, by virtue of this renewal of relations with the powers having supervisory relation to the administration of the Kongo State, we may at this juncture with entire propriety suggest to the powers the importance of meeting again for consideration of the grave reports now current, and may also without impropriety participate in the discussions of such meetings, while declining to act in provisions implying definitely supervisory functions.

It may be noted that assurance of recognition by the powers of the propriety of such manifestation of concern is afforded by the desire so strongly expressed at Brussels for continued participation by our Government in the settlement of issues in the Kongo territory. It will be recalled that one important action of the conference at Brussels was modified in form because, as the president, a representative of Belgium, stated, a different form of proceduce would be "desirable in view of facilitating the accession to the treaty of a great power, which, from the very beginning of the labors of the conference, has given token of its sincere sympathy with the work undertaken and of the cooperation which it is disposed to give it, a cooperation which the conference has great interest in receiving."

POWERS AND OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE BRUSSELS ACT.

We would further ask your attention to the fact that the Brussels conference, regarded independently of its relations to the preceding conference, apparently offers ground for action by our Government. You will recall that this conference represented a joint cooperative effort for relief of conditions in the Kongo territory. While dealing primarily with measures for "repression of the African slave trade," it was animated by a purpose of larger scope disclosed by the declaration of its aim of "effectively protecting the original population of Africa and securing for this vast continent the benefits of peace and civilization."

Certain engagements were entered into by the powers administering government in the designated territory, certain other engagements falling to the contiguous powers and certain minor engagements belonging to all the signatories; but all alike committed themselves to the cooperative purpose represented by the conference. It would appear also that the United States Government was a full signatory of the general act of Brussels, France alone ratifying the agreement partially, as is indicated by the protocol signed at Brussels January 2, 1892. The reservation made in the action of the United States was of the character of a memorandum presenting an interpretation of the scope of the act, an interpretation conceded by the other signatory powers.

We recall that the President of the United States, in making publication of the general act of Brussels, states that it was duly ratified, together with the protocol of January 2, by the United States Government, and adds that the act is "made public to the end that the same, and every article and clause thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

We would urge that, under the general act of Brussels, our Government is entitled to suggest to the powers the propriety and importance of instituting an inquiry to determine whether the government of the Kongo State, by its permission of conditions reproducing the worst horrors of the slave trade, is not in violation of the spirit, and of certain specific engagements, of its agreement under the act of Brussels, and that it may inquire, further, whether the system of monopolization of territory and products maintained and enforced by the Kongo government is not itself fatally hostile to the discharge of the engagements contracted by the government in the act of Brussels and thus fatal to the purpose of the powers as represented by that act. It would further appear that our Government, having the power, is under obligation to take this course in view of the extreme gravity of current reports.

It is noteworthy that, in its treaty with the Kongo State, our Government makes mention of the obligations which that State has contracted by virtue of the act of Brussels, and indicates its desire to facilitate discharge of these obligations (Article X).

OTHER INDEPENDENT GROUNDS OF ACTION.

While holding, as we have thus indicated, that our Government is entitled to participate in the proposed international consideration of conditons in the Kongo State, and that it is important that at this juncture it shall discharge its full responsibility for the protection of a cruelly wronged people, we would ask your attention to the treaty relations sustained by the United States to the Kongo Government. The treaty pledged "full, entire, and reciprocal liberty of commerce," and provides that "the citizens of the United States can freely exercise their industry or their business in the whole extent" of the territory of the Kongo State, a provision with which the commercial system maintained in the Kongo State is in direct conflict. It provides also for resort to a tribunal of arbitration "in case difference of views shall arise respecting the maintenance, obligation, or interpretation of any provision of the engagement."

It is apparent that yet another form of action is open to our Government, which has certain rights by virtue of its membership in the family of nations. The reserved right belonging to individuals and nations to protest against iniquity and to intervene for the protection of helpless victims of oppression is inalienable with our Government.

HISTORICAL POSITION OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

The Kongo Reform Association, representing citizens of all sections of the country, irrespective of party or religious connection, is deeply concerned that our Government shall not fail to discharge its just obligations for relief of the unjust and cruel conditions to which we have invited your attention. We recall the interest taken by the United States in the avowed philanthropic mission of the Kongo State, the recognition promptly extended to it, and the favor shown to it at critical periods of its history.

The position of our Government, as defined by its relation to the conferences, would seem to give us a unique advantage in that we have conspicuously declined to accept any form of political benefit in this territory, and may, therefore, act for the protection if its people without suspicion of other than high and generous motives. We recall that in entering the conference at Berlin our representative, Mr. Terrell, said: "The Government of the United States has wished to show the great interest and deep sympathy it feels in the great work of philanthropy which the conference seeks to realize. Our country must feel beyond all others an immense interest in the work of this assembly." In urging a full participation by our Government in the action of the conference, it was remarked by a prominent member of that body: "We attach the highest value to the cooperation of the United States in our work. We know that their traditional policy is to stand aloof from the treaties and political arrangements of European nations, but the work which we are carrying on is purely humanitarian; its only object is the extinction of the slave trade and the improvement of the negro's lot—an object for which the United States has so often poured out blood and treasure."

The president of the conference, Baron Lambermont, a representative of Belgium, remarked: "The president continues to hope that the Government of the United States, which was the first to recognize the Kongo Free State, will not be one of the last to give it the assistance of which it may stand in need."

With an unfaltering confidence that the action taken by our Government will be in accord with these generous sentiments, and that through it this people, disfranchised of the sacred rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, may rise at length from their low estate to that place in the commonwealth of nations for which development under a just rule may fit them, our communication is respectfully submitted.

DOCUMENT A.

An appeal from missionaries in the Kongo State.

KINCHASSA, STANLEY POOL,
KONGO INDEPENDENT STATE,
January 11, 1906.

We, the undersigned evangelical missionaries from Great Britain, the United States of America, Canada, Germany, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, working on the Kongo, many of whom have been in the country for over twenty years, being assembled at our third general conference at Kinchassa, Stanley Pool, desire to place on record our views as to the present state of affairs in this country. We had hoped when we last met two years ago that some amelioration of the unhappy condition of things existing would be effected, but we profoundly regret to state that in many parts of the land this condition is still unaltered.

We are greatly disappointed that the memorial presented to the sovereign of the state, through the governor-general, on 1st of March, 1904, has elicited no reply.

We regret that the report of the commission of inquiry as published does not convey to the general public an adequate impression of what has occurred, since so much evidence presented has been omitted or only referred to in very modified terms.

Although we recognize the courtesy of the commissioners and their impartiality in hearing evidence and feel gratified by the fact that their findings have entirely justified the attitude taken by missionaries and others in exposing the terrible state of affairs, we still feel that the reforms suggested are merely palliative, leaving untouched the main root of the evil, which we all recognize to be the system in force. On the one hand this system, wherever applied, robs the native of his right to the free use of the land and its products and, on the other, compels him to labor as a serf under the name of taxation, while for the most part practically nothing is being done for the good of the natives thus taxed.

We are convinced that the atrocities, which have been abundantly proved, and which still continue to be perpetrated, no less than the general oppression resulting from this so-called "taxation," are the natural outcome of the system adopted, of the radical alteration of which we see no sign.

Several missionaries present [from the interior] have testified that the acts of oppression complained of are still practiced, and, despite the recommendations of the commission, practically no attempts have been made to change the old régime. We earnestly protest against this continued disregard of all the appeals and evidence laid before the authorities.

We also emphatically protest against the repeated refusal to sell sites for mission stations to our societies, contrary to the provisions of the general act of the conference of Berlin. We have never been other than loyal to the State, and have borne this and other grievances which we would have more strongly protested against but that we hoped they were only a passing phase of affairs.

We have no object in view but that of the interests of humanity and the desire that the natives shall not be caused to disappear from off the face of the earth. And so we would utter again our solemn protest against the terrible state of affairs still existing in the Kongo State, and we appeal in the name of justice, liberty, and humanity to those who value these blessings to help in every lawful way to secure them for all the Kongo peoples.

Trusting in Almighty God, we send forth this our protest and appeal.

DOCUMENT B.

Extracts from the Commission's report.[a]

MATERIAL DEVELOPMENT.

In this sinister and mysterious continent a state has become constituted and organized with a marvelous rapidity, introducing into the heart of Africa the benefits of civilization. To-day security reigns in this immense territory. Almost everywhere the white man, where not animated with hostile intentions, can penetrate without escort or arms. Towns resembling our most coquettish seaside resorts, which lighten up and animate the banks of the great river; and the two rail heads of the Lower Congo Railway—Matadi, where the ocean steamers arrive, and Leopoldville,[b] the great fluvial port, with the activity of its dockyards, make one think of busy European cities.

GOVERNMENT FIRMLY ESTABLISHED.

With a limited number of officials the State has accomplished the task of effectively occupying and administering its great domain. By the wise distribution of its government stations it has succeeded in coming into contact with what is practically the whole native population. The villages are now few which fail to recognize the authority of "Boula Matadi." Reports received periodically enable it to profit immediately from the experience of its 2,000 agents. On its side it lets its directing power be felt. From instructions constantly forwarded to the department chiefs it makes known a programme to be followed by the officials of every grade. The unity of administration is found everywhere.

APPROPRIATION OF LAND AND PRODUCTS.

In default of a legal definition, it seems to have been generally admitted on the Kongo that lands considered as being occupied by the natives are exclusively the portions of territory upon which they have established their villages or raised their plantations.

It has even been admitted that on the land occupied by them, the natives can not dispose of the produce of the soil except to the extent in which they did so before the constitution of the State.

As the greater portion of the land in the Kongo is not under cultivation, this interpretation concedes to the State a right of absolute and exclusive ownership over virtually the whole of the land,[c] with this consequence: That it can dispose—itself and solely—of all the products of the soil; prosecute as a poacher anyone who takes from that land the least of its fruits, or as a receiver of stolen goods anyone who receives such fruit.

THE NATIVE—POSSESSES NOTHING.

There are no native reserves, and, apart from the rough plantations which barely suffice to feed the natives themselves and to supply the stations, all the fruits of the soil are considered as the property of the State or of the concessionaire societies. Thus, although the freedom of trade is formally recognized by law, the native does not own in many places the objects which constitute trade.

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE PROHIBITED.

The laws of the State guarantee in the most absolute manner the personal liberty of the natives who enjoy, in the same manner as the white man, the right of traveling all over the territory. Such, moreover, is the doctrine of the courts, who have affirmed this incontestable right. However, the local government has in recent circulars appeared to contest, if not the strict right, at least the possibility of the native displacing himself. These circulars, based upon the principle that all land not effectively occupied belongs to the State, deduce therefrom the consequence that the native can not settle elsewhere than in the village where he was born without obtaining the authorization of the State beforehand.

The activity of the natives is thus limited to very restricted areas, and their economic condition is immobilized. Thus abusively applied such legislation would prevent any development of native life. In this manner not only has the native been often forbidden to shift his village, but he has even been forbidden to visit, even temporarily, a neighboring village without special permit. A native displacing himself without being the bearer of such an authorization would leave himself open to arrest, to be taken back and even punished.

ALL PRODUCTS CLAIMED BY THE STATE.

The labor tax is the only impost possible on the Kongo, because the native, as a general rule, possesses nothing beyond his hut, his weapons, and a few plantations strictly necessary for his subsistence.[d]

It is useful to point out that according to the arrete of 5th October, 1889, "any person can use his weapons to defend his life or property threatened by one or several elephants. If the adoption of such measures lead to the capture or the death of the elephant, the animal must be handed over to the district commissioner."

DEFENSE OF SMALL PAYMENT MADE TO NATIVES FOR PRODUCTS OF COUNTRY.

It is just, on the other hand, that remuneration should be limited to the value of the labor furnished by the native, and that he should not be paid according to the value of the produce obtainable by his work, because as a rule the produce does not belong to him—he merely furnishes the work necessary to secure it.

COLLECTION OF PRODUCTS AND BONUSES TO AGENTS.

Each official in charge of a station, or agent in charge of a factory, claimed from the natives, without asking himself on what grounds, the most divers imposts in labor or in kind, either to satisfy his own needs and those of his station, or to exploit the riches of the domain.

When the agent was reasonable, he endeavored to conciliate the interests of the State or the companies with those of the natives, and sometimes he obtained much without violent measures, but numbers of agents only thought of one thing—to obtain as much as possible in the shortest possible time; and their demands were often excessive. This is not at all astonishing, at any rate as regards the gathering of the produce of the domain. For the agents themselves regulated the tax and saw to its collection and had a direct interest in increasing its amount, since they received proportional bonuses on the produce thus collected.[e]

THE FOOD TAX.

The population in the first zone must furnish the kwanga every four days; those in the second, every eight days; those in the third, every twelve days. Such is the system. Its inconveniences can immediately be observed. All the witnesses heard by the commission have been unanimous in criticising, notably the exaggerated quantity imposed upon the women of certain villages, the continuity of the imposition, and the long journeys demanded of the taxpayers. The most painful aspect of this tax is its continuity. As kwanga only keeps for a few days, the native, even by duplicating his activity, can not succeed in liberating himself from the imposition for a lengthy period. This imposition, even if it does not demand the whole of his time, weighs upon him continually by the short time elapsing between the supplies he has to furnish, which causes the tax to lose its true character and transforms it into a veritable corvee, since there is always with him the thought of the delivery that must soon be made.

These carriers are the people who constitute the industrious element in the village, and if the greater part of their time is absorbed by the exigencies of the tax and the necessity of providing for their own sustenance, they have barely the time, even if they show good will, to devote themselves to anything else; whence comes the abandonment of native industries and the incontestible impoverishment of the villages. Missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, whom we heard at Leopoldville, were unanimous in accentuating the general wretchedness existing in the region. One of them said that "this system, which compels the natives to feed 3,000 workmen at Leopoldville, will, if continued for another five years, wipe out the population of the district."

It is not admissible that one should be compelled to travel 150 kilometers (94 miles) to bring to the place of delivery a tax representing a value of about 1½ francs (30 cents).

As for the sheep, the goats, the fowls, and the ducks, the commission was able to observe for itself their increasing scarcity, and consequently their dearness. What is the reason for this impoverishment? Precisely because these animals, instead of being an object of commerce, are demanded as a tax, often in a most arbitrary fashion. The native who only receives remuneration insufficient in his eyes, and in any case notably inferior to the real value, is not in the least encouraged to breed goats or fowls.

Apart from a few kilograms of fresh fish for the white men, which are generally furnished without difficulty, virtually the entire produce of native fisheries consists in rations of dried fish for the black workmen. This imposition gives rise to the same inconveniencies as in the case of the kwanga imposition. Almost everywhere the quantities demanded have given rise to complaints, especially on the part of chiefs of villages, the population of which had decreased, and which were taxed disproportionally to the number of their inhabitants. We found that, some of the banks of the river being sparsely populated, stations like those of Nouvelle Anvers, for instance, were compelled to call in the services of fishermen a long way off. Natives inhabiting the neighborhood of Lulonga were compelled to travel in canoes to Nouvelle Anvers, a journey of from 40 to 50 miles, every fortnight, to bring their fish, and taxpayers have been imprisoned for delays which were, perhaps, not attributable to them, if one bears in mind the considerable distances to be traversed to satisfy the demands made by the imposition.[f]

THE PORTERAGE SYSTEM.

Judicial officials have informed us of the sorry consequences of the porterage system; it exhausts the wretched people who are subjected to it, and threatens them with partial destruction.[g]

RUBBER COLLECTION.

This circumstance—exhaustion of the rubber—explains the repugnance of the native for rubber work, which, in itself, is not particularly painful. In the majority of cases the native must go one or two days' march every fortnight, until he arrives at that part of the forest where the rubber vines can be met with in a certain degree of abundance.

[a] These representative extracts are carefully verified translations of the original French of the report, indorsed as accurate by the local committee of the association.

[b] Regarding the condition of the natives of this region, the commission speaks in a later paragraph: "The general wretchedness, etc." See p. 24. Compare with this the description given of the State's school at Boma, p. 35. Of like import is the statement in the memorial to Congress, April, 1904: "Certain material enterprises, as the railway, bear witness to great energy and perseverance, though identified with terrible cost to the lives of the natives; but these enterprises are connected directly with the one aim which, unhappily, seems to have absorbed the energies of government—that of enriching itself by a swift exploitation of the natural products of the State."

[c] The claim leading to this appropriation by the government of the vast Kongo territory first appeared in a document issued July 1, 1885, which at the time was supposed to be dictated by concern for the rights of the natives. It declared that "no one may dispossess any native of land occupied by him," adding that "all vacant land is considered as belonging to the State." Later, through successive public edicts, the breadth of the term "vacant" became apparent.

[d] The report states that "some products have been allowed to the natives;" it instances "palm kernels, which form the object of an important export trade in the lower Kongo." It should be borne in mind that it is only in this territory of the lower Kongo, a district representing but the one-hundredth part of the area of the State, that any form of trade is found. Above Stanley Pool the sale of any product by natives or the purchase of products by a foreign trader is a crime.

[e] Payment to agents of the State of bonuses, varying with the amount of rubber and ivory obtained by them was strenuously denied by the Government until M. Vandervelde, in the Belgian Parliament, produced a circular of the governor-general establishing the practice, with letters from the secretary of state, in which the system was elaborated. The commission states that the law establishing the system of bonuses has been rescinded, but admits that it is charged that the system is universally prevalent under another name.

[f] The report recommends that the State shall "itself partially supply stations with dried fish and rice." It is thus made apparent that the entire military force, numbering some 30,000 men, besides the thousands of workmen and the European agents, have been quartered upon the people, the impost being laid upon the several localities concerned without regard to the strength or feebleness of the population.

[g] Corroboration of this statement is given by Mr. Glave, the companion of Stanley. "I saw the dead body of a carrier lying on the trail. He was nothing but skin and bone. These posts ought to give some care to porters. The heartless disregard for life is abominable. No wonder the State is hated." (Century Magazine, vol. 54, p. 713.)

There the collector passes a number of days in a miserable existence. He has to build himself an improvised shelter, which can not, obviously, replace his hut. He has not the food to which he is accustomed. He is deprived of his wife, exposed to the inclemencies of the weather, and the attacks of wild beasts. When once he has collected the rubber he must bring it to the State station or to that of the company, and only then can he return to his village where he can sojourn for barely more than two or three days, because the next demand is upon him.[a]

THE RULE OF FORCE.

The only legal means at the disposal of the State for compelling the native to work is by ordaining a labor tax.

As soon as the territory near to the villages was exhausted, and, consequently, the labor of the native become more painful, force was alone able to conquer the apathy of the native.

The disinclination of the negro for all work; his particular antipathy to gathering rubber, have made force a necessity.

The native only understands, only respects, force. He confounds it with justice. The State must be able to insure the triumph of law, and consequently force the native to work.

From what precedes, it may be concluded, we think, that everywhere on the Kongo, notwithstanding certain appearances to the contrary, the native only collects rubber under the influence of force, directly or indirectly exercised.

Very often, then, in order to secure workmen, force has been used and chiefs have been compelled to furnish workers as they have furnished soldiers.

Until recently this compulsion has been exerted in divers ways, such as carrying away of hostages, imprisonment of chiefs, stationing sentinels or overseers, fines, and armed expeditions.

Officials in charge of stations, arrogating to themselves a right which never belonged to them, have flogged rubber collectors who have not completely satisfied the requirements demanded of them. Some have even committed outrages, which is established by the judgments of the courts. Natives instructed to supervise the prisoners have been guilty of acts of violence toward them, often of the gravest character.

THE SENTRY SYSTEM.

By sentries are meant the black overseers, equipped with muzzle-loading guns, whose official duty it is to direct the work of the natives in the forest. The greater part of their time, however, seems to be spent in reminding the natives of their obligations, making sure that they go to the forest, and accompanying the gatherers when they return to the post.

Among these overseers some, who make up the personnel of the post and who almost always are strangers to the region, go to the villages during working hours and report to the whites those who are idling at home instead of being at work. Frequently, that more complete supervision may be had, they are delegated to a village to stay permanently.

This system of native supervisors has given rise to numerous criticisms, even on the part of State officials. The Protestant missionaries heard at Bolobo, Ikoko (Lake Mantumba), Lulonga, Bonginda, Ikau, Baringa, and Bongandanga, drew up formidable accusations against the acts of these intermediaries.

They brought before the commission a multitude of native witnesses who revealed a large number of crimes and excesses alleged to have been committed by the sentinels. According to the witnesses, these auxillaries, especially those stationed in the villages, abuse the authority conferred upon them, convert themselves into despots, claiming the women and the food, not only for themselves but for the body of parasites and creatures without any calling which a love of rapine causes to become associated with them, and with whom they surround themselves as with a veritable bodyguard; they kill without pity all those who attempt to resist their exactions and whims. The commission was obviously unable in all cases to verify the exactitude of the allegations made before it, the more so as the facts were often several years old. However, the truth of the charges is borne out by a mass of evidence and official reports.

Of how many abuses the native sentinels have been guilty it would be impossible to say, even approximately. Several chiefs of Baringa brought us, according to the native custom, bundles of sticks, each of which was meant to show one of their subjects killed by the capitas.

The accusations against the sentries seem to be well founded. Moreover, the agents examined by the commission or present at its sittings did not even attempt to refute them. The least unfavorable opinion about the sentries was that of the manager of the Abir company, who said, "The sentry is an evil, but a necessary evil." We can not share this view. In our judgment the institution, as we have seen it at work in the Abir and Lulonga territories, should be suppressed.

There is no despot more cruel than a black given control of other blacks, when unrestrained by ties of race, family, or tradition.

FLOGGING WITH THE CHICOTTE.

The blacks employed by the State should accept, along with the other conditions of their contract, the disciplinary punishments which practically are the same as apply to the soldiers. The use of the chicotte is the most frequent form of punishment. The rules indicate fifty strokes as the maximum, and not more than twenty-five may be given an offender in any one day. In case of a wound being caused, or fainting, the strokes must cease immediately.[b]

Despite the provisions of the law as to the use of the chicotte, violations at times occur, either in its too frequent use for minor offenses or in exceeding the prescribed number of strokes.

MUTILATIONS.

It is principally during armed expeditions that the mutilations occurred to which certain witnesses, and particularly the Protestant missionaries, drew the attention of the commission.

It is more than probable that at the beginning of the occupation some white officers tolerated this barbarous custom (of cutting off hands) or at least did not do what they could to root it out. The result of this has been the mutilation of living natives whom the soldiers or sentries had believed to be dead.[c]

THE HOSTAGE SYSTEM.

When the rubber fell short, the agents arrested the chief of the village, or seized as hostages some of the inhabitants, often women, taken haphazard, * * * and kept them sometimes for several months.

We were, it is true, assured that the prisoners were not badly treated, that excessive labors were not imposed upon them. We have even been told that the lot of the women prisoners was not more painful than the existence of beasts of burden to which native custom subjects them. Nevertheless it is undeniable that imprisonment has often been aggravated by its accompanying circumstances.

We were informed that the houses of detention were often in a very bad state, that the prisoners were insufficiently fed, and that the death rate amongst them was high.[b]

ABUSE OF NATIVE CHIEFS.

The intermediary between the white man and the natives ought to be, as far as practicable, the village chief. * * * These, indeed, govern often in a paternal manner; in every case their rule is accepted by the populations. The natives hold them in much respect and affection, and it is very rarely indeed that they complain of them. We refer here only to the chiefs of villages or of shall groups of villages.

Chiefs have been utilized to get labor from the natives and imposts, but only by making them personally responsible for all shortages and for all the faults of their people, without recognizing their being possessed of any rights or authority over their people. Many have disappeared or lie hidden; others refuse all contact with the white man.

The imprisonment of the chiefs has completely destroyed their authority, the more so as they have been forced to the performance of servile tasks.

MILITARY EXPEDITIONS.

Frequently expeditions of this kind are simple reconnaissances, a peaceful tour, in the course of which the white officer simply leads his troops into the disobedient or delinquent village. He puts himself in touch with the chiefs, convincing the blacks, who care for nothing but force, of the power of the state and showing them the futility of allowing their obstinacy to bring them into conflict with the regular troops. Often this mode of procedure produces admirable results.

Occasionally it is deemed necessary to act more energetically. In such cases the written order given by his superior to the commander of the expedition was limited to the direction that he should "recall the natives to their duties." The most frequent result is that the natives flee at the approach of the expedition without attempting any resistance. The practice generally followed then consisted in occupying the deserted village or the neighboring plantations. Driven by hunger, the natives come back, either singly or in small groups. They arrest them and try to lay hold of the chiefs or headmen, who almost always yield, pledging themselves never again to fail in their obligations, and sometimes they are compelled to pay a fine besides. When it happens that the natives delay in reappearing, the customary plan is the sending of search parties to beat the bush and bring in all the natives they may find. The dangers of this system are readily seen. The armed black left alone feels the reviving of the old sanguinary instinct, which even the most rigid discipline can with difficulty hold in check. It is in connection with this form of service that the greater part of the murders have been committed for which the state soldiers are reproached.

A still more difficult operation is that of the expedition sent out to capture the fugitives.

The vague indefiniteness of the orders given, and sometimes the irresponsibility of those charged with their execution, have frequently resulted in unjustifiable murders. It often happens that the natives, to escape the payment of the tax, and especially the collection of rubber, migrate singly or in a body, and go to settle another district. Then a detachment of troops is sent after them who, sometimes by persuasion, sometimes after a fight, bring the fugitives back again.

In the course of such expeditions grave abuses have occurred; men, women, and children have been killed even at the very time they sought safety in flight. Others have been imprisoned. Women have been taken as hostages.

At times the military expedition assumes a character still more openly repressive. The order given to the commander of an expedition was generally worded as follows: "N——— is instructed to punish or chastise such and such a village."

Military action of this nature always goes beyond its purpose; the penalty being in flagrant disproportion to the offense. The guilty and the innocent are involved in the same punishment.

The consequences are often most sanguinary. And this is not surprising. If, in the course of delicate operations for the capture of hostages and intimidation of the natives, constant watchfulness could not always prevent the blood-thirsty instincts of the blacks from breaking close—when orders to punish are given by superior authority it is difficult to prevent the expedition from degenerating into massacres, accompanied by pillage and incendiarism.

In considering these facts one must bear in mind the deplorable con-

[a] An edict, limiting the labor requirement to forty hours per month, was issued November 18, 1903. It appears that the commission found the edict a dead letter. In another paragraph it is definitely stated that this act was neutralized at the outset by an action of the governor-general. (See p. 41.)

With this may be compared the following earlier edict: "I beg to bring to your notice that from January 1, 1899, it is necessary that 4,000 kilos of India rubber shall be furnished every month. To insure this result, I give you carte blanche." (Written instructions of Commandant Verstraten, district commissioner in the Kongo State, to his subordinates.)

Compare with this the declaration made by the Kongo government in July, 1900. (See p. 43.)

[b] Compare testimony of witnesses, pp. 49, 60, 62.

[c] The commission is disposed to believe that this practice of mutilation perpetuates an original native custom. This conclusion is at variance with views strongly expressed by those familiar with the country for many years. As to the main fact—that the severed hands are brought to the white agents as proof that orders given them have been executed—there appears to be no difference between the conclusions of the commission and the statements of missionaries and other independent witnesses.

[b] A missionary, who read the above, comments: "I shall never forget the impression left on my mind by the sight of one of these horrible houses of detention. It was at Mompona, in the A. B. I. R. territory. It was a small, low-roofed, circular building, with the only entrance to it through another building of the same type. The latter was occupied by a number of sentries with Albini rifles. Inside the other were herded a large number of women, girls, and boys—a mass of bones held together by black skin. I addressed myself to one poor skeleton of a woman lying in front of me where I stood. I asked her if she was sick. 'Two days ago,' she answered, 'I gave birth to a child, and, oh! white man, I am dying of hunger; I've had nothing to eat.' She was so weak that it was with difficulty she could articulate her words. And oh, the faces of those others! The horror of it! Outside the building there was a row of those skeleton women in the chain, followed by a sentry with an Albini and a chicotte, going back and forward from the garden to the river."

fusion still existing in the Upper Kongo between a state of war and a state of peace; between administration and repression; between those who may be regarded as enemies and those who have the right to be regarded as citizens of the State and treated in accordance with its laws. The commission was struck with the general tone of the reports relating to operations described above. Often, while admitting that the expedition had been sent out solely for shortage in taxation, and without making allusion to an attack or resistance on the part of the natives, which alone would justify the use of arms, the authors of these reports speak of "surprising villages," "energetic pursuit," "numerous enemies killed and wounded," "loot," "prisoners of war," "conditions of peace." Evidently these officers thought themselves at war—acted as though at war. This situation can not be prolonged. In the interests of the people and of the agents of the Government, the natives must not be open to find themselves treated from one day to another as enemies beyond the pale of the law. In any case it should be understood that the mere fact of a delay or shortage in the payment of taxes, if it gives rise to the use of force, should not justify expectations having the character of operations of war.

We hasten to say that military expeditions of this nature have become rare in most of the districts.[a]

DEPOPULATION OF COUNTRY.

Several missionaries heard by the commission pointed out the depopulation they said they had noticed in some regions known to them. It is evident that the commission could not arrive at a conclusion in this respect. Nevertheless, if we accept Stanley's figures, it is incontestable that a large part of the population must have disappeared, for, from Stanley Pool to Nouvelle Anvers, the banks of the river are almost deserted.

It often happens that the natives, in order to escape from taxes, and especially from the rubber tax, emigrate in twos or threes, or en masse, and settle in another region or even in another district.

It may easily be conceived that the riverine peoples, who were the first to feel the impositions levied by the white man, should have endeavored to escape from these impositions, and have taken refuge on French territory, or in other parts of the territory, where they assumed the impositions could not reach them. The population has in some cases been drained, so to speak, by the frequent levies of soldiers and workmen.

It is not too bold to assert that at the present time the great majority of the natives escape all imposts either because of the incomplete penetration of their territory (by the white man) or because of the exodus of the population whom former exigencies or the proceedings of certain agents have terrified.[b]

It must not be inferred from the foregoing that the population is everywhere decreasing or that the unions are always sterile. In the Lopori and the Maringa basins, and upon the banks of the Kongo River, from Mobeka to the falls, as well, we have noticed that there are frequent villages and a considerable number of young children.

THE STATE'S CONTRACT SYSTEM.

The law demands that each master or employer shall see to it that every contract for services is written out and presented to the proper authority for indorsement. Sanction can not be given until it is certain that the workman understands perfectly and accepts voluntarily the conditions of the engagement.

On the Upper Kongo, on the contrary, it may be said that almost nowhere are the intentions of the legislator—not to say the letter of the law—regarded.

The unfortunate effects of long engagements are peculiarly observable in the case of children. The district commissioners employ, especially for the work in the fields, children 7 and 8 years of age, who find themselves bound for many years by a contract which possibly they have voluntarily accepted, but whose full meaning certainly they were not in a position to know. Now, by the instruction of the director of justice, the officials can not refuse to sanction contracts if the children say they accept them.

THE WARDS OF THE STATE.

At Boma and at New Antwerp there have been established what are called "educational colonies." * * * Native children up to the age of 12 years are allowed to enter these colonies. They follow three courses or three years of study.

The State has incurred the reproach of "recruiting," under pretense of helping—but against the desire of the parties interested—young natives who are wanted to fill the ranks of its constabulary.

The State retains guardianship of the children until their twenty-fifth year. The duration of this tutelage is excessive. The decree fails to appreciate native conditions of life; 30 or 35 years is usually the limit of the length of life of the black; his sixteenth year is the beginning of adult age, and the result of this provision practically is to keep the wards of the State almost to the end of their life in the position of minors.

The dormitories at Boma are built of bamboo, which the cold night wind easily penetrates. Thus exposed the children develop lung trouble, to which the native offers but feeble resistance. On this account the death rate among the pupils of the State is quite large.

Feeling such a condition intolerable, the present director of the colony set about replacing these dormitories by solid brick buildings. But falling short of funds he had to use the young pupils themselves to do the work. Children of from 6 to 12 years of age had to dry and carry bricks. Their studies consequently were completely interrupted, and, without advantage to their intellectual or even practical development, the children were changed into laborers and kept at work which often exceeded their strength.

THE CONCESSIONARY SOCIETIES.[c]

By concession is meant the right given to commercial companies, for a considerable financial return, to gather exclusively for their own profit certain products of the territories of the State.

The concessionaire societies, by the fact that they are commercial, pursue lucre and not humanity and civilization.

It is apparent that such a company, upon which the State has imposed no restrictions, regards itself as absolute mistress in its domain, and it is not to be wondered at that the laws of the State have been openly violated.

In order to allow the companies to use this (coercion) the State, claiming a right to a certain amount of labor as an assessment, delegated its powers in part to the concessions. That is to say, it authorized these societies to require of the blacks labor in the rubber forests and also other forms of assessment, and to use coercion in obtaining them.

It is in the territories exploited by the concessionary companies that the most flagrant abuses have been committed.

These (concessionaire) societies have done nothing in the interest of the natives or to improve the regions they occupy.

It was barely denied that in the various posts of the A. B. I. R. which we visited, the imprisonment of women hostages, the subjection of the chiefs to servile labor, the humiliations meted out to them, the flogging of rubber collectors, the brutality of the black employees set over the prisoners, were the rule commonly followed.[b]

THE HIGHER COURTS COMMENDED.

The commission has received no complaint throughout its long investigation, and makes no criticism, as to the discharge of their important and delicate duties by the courts administered by trained magistrates.

A FUNDAMENTAL DEFECT OF THE JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION.

The unsatisfactory character of this (system of) judicial centralization appears at once, for it involves extension of the jurisdiction of the Boma court through the whole country.

EXPERIENCE OF WITNESSES.

It is a sorrowful truth, which experience has demonstrated, so the magistrates tell us, that a large number of native witnesses compelled to go from the upper Kongo to Boma never see their villages again, but die during the voyage which is imposed upon them. The resistance of the natives to change of diet and climate is, so to speak, nil. The mere word "Boma" terrifies them. Thus, at the present moment it is very difficult, if not impossible, in many regions of the upper Kongo to induce the natives to testify before the tribunals. The inhabitant of the upper Kongo summoned as a witness flies to the forest. He must be treated as a criminal—hunted, chained sometimes; in any case subjected to force—to conduct him from his village to the court.

Even when all possible care is extended to them the ranks of these unfortunates are found to be very rapidly reduced by a homesick longing for the great equatorial forests. It is, therefore, not surprising that the deaths are still more numerous when, as sometimes happens during their long journey or in the localities in which they are to render their testimony, they are given unsuitable lodgings or are without sufficient food.[c]

Before the records, the witnesses, and the accused party can be brought to court many months, years even, pass. Meanwhile the white agents have returned to Europe, the negroes are no longer to be found, recollections are effaced, the facts are transformed into legends.

It is needless to call attention to the great injury wrought by this state of things to the prestige of law and the judicial administration.

It often happens that the injured native, rather than expose himself to the dangers and fatigues of a voyage to Boma, declines to complain.

[a] Unfortunately this impression is not supported by the latest testimony. See pp. 64–72.

[b] The commission, in general, is inclined to attribute the shocking decline in the population primarily to other causes than the wrongs suffered under the rule of Government. The effect of these wrongs in promoting depopulation is, however, clearly recognized. Missionaries of long residence in the country uniformly ascribe the swift decrease in population to administrative abuses.

For example, Mr. Gilchrist, referring to certain diseases to which the decline has been attributed, says:

"With regard to the causes of depopulation in the Lolanga district, where I have lived for fourteen years, I emphatically affirm that for one who has died of sleeping sickness there have been twenty deaths due to lung and intestinal diseases, and for one death due to smallpox there have been forty due to lung and intestinal troubles. Sleeping sickness has been in our district not more than seven years and never epidemic. Smallpox we have had twice in fourteen years, and comparatively few died of it. The lung and intestinal diseases are without doubt due, in a very large proportion of the cases, to exposure involved in collecting the taxes and in hiding from the soldiers in the forests, as well as the miserable huts the natives now live in, because they have neither time nor heart to build better."

[c] In these the King has as a rule not less than one-half interest.

[b] Endeavor is made to shield the State (the King) from responsibility for the excesses characterizing the rule of these societies. But these societies are commissioned by the State. The King is a controlling shareholder in the A. B. I. R. Company, for example, whose notorious maladministration figures so conspicuously in the report. His interests in this company a few years ago had a market value of $6,000,000. Documents have been published which show that State soldiers have been supplied regularly to these companies for enforcement of their exactions, and that great quantities of ammunition have been furnished them. The report shows also incidentally that commissioners of state have made visits to this section, and that official reports have been made to the central administration of all their transactions. It should be borne in mind also that even the horrors disclosed in the territory of the Abir trust do not surpass those revealed in the private domain of the King (Domaine Prive), as recorded in Mr. Scrivener's visit to this territory. (See Memorial to Congress, pp. 51, 52.)

[c] The death of so many witnesses during the journey to the lower river can hardly be ascribed solely to natural causes. This painful passage in the commission's report suggests apprehension that the fears of the natives must have operated in some cases to prevent the giving of testimony freely to the commission and that even this damaging report may unavoidably fall short of a full disclosure of the conditions the commission sought to investigate. Compare with this the following:

"The commission arrived on Tuesday, 15th November, 1904. I had a telegram on Sunday asking me to have witnesses in all readiness for the following day, but the exigencies of steamer life delayed them until Tuesday. I got as many witnesses as possible from the riverine towns; there was no time to attempt to get any from inland. If there had been time given, I am not sure whether I could have obtained any witnesses, for two reasons: (1) The inland people particularly are greatly afraid of giving evidence, lest worse should befall them, (2) and I had not food for them during their stay, for the food I was able to grow on my station was not sufficient for my men and boys, and the weekly kwanga tax was a great drain on the resources of the villagers. The inquiry was held on one of the steamers with all formality, and was as public as the limits of the steamer permitted. At the close of the inquiry the witnesses were paid some pieces of cloth to share among themselves.

"There was not, so far as I know, any direct attempt to suborn witnesses at Lukolela either before, for, or after the Commission's inquiry. The only thing we had to overcome was the fear engendered by the previous treatment witnesses have experienced in detention and removal to Leopoldville." (Rev. John Whitehead, Lukolela.)

Infractions remain ignored abuses multiply themselves, the discontent of the people increases, and even manifests itself suddenly by violence and revolts which the intervention of justice might have prevented.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

The commissioners have observed in the prisons the presence—often in considerable numbers—of inmates who appear upon the lists as political prisoners. They are incarcerated under a simple order from the administrative authority. The cause of their arrest in general is in no way political. As a rule, they are natives who have neglected to meet their assessments. There are others who have given shelter to those who were delinquent or who were fleeing from justice.

A HELPLESS JUDICIARY.

It is strange to observe that while the law surrounds with serious safeguards individual liberty it should allow administrative action to be deprived, so to speak, of all check or contro[1].

Judicial officers can not, according to government regulations, prosecute Europeans without the permission of the public prosecutor himself (who resides in Boma, the capital), and the public prosecutor can not accede to the request without the permission of the governor-general, who has supreme supervision over the machinery of the law.

The deputy of the court, when upon his circuit, has need of transportation, food supplies, and an escort. Now, in this respect he is entirely dependent upon the commissioner of the district, who can give or withhold the canoe, the soldiers or the police officers, the rations.

The commission found, indeed, that very often proceedings which had been started by the assistants of the public prosecutor against white men accused of having ill treated natives were not followed up owing to administrative decision. No motives being assigned for these decisions, it would be difficult to say to what extent they were justified. In any case, it is necessary that henceforth the responsibility of such measures should be left to the judicial authority.[a]

THE MISSIONARY.

Often also, in the regions where evangelical stations are established, the native, instead of going to the magistrate, his rightful protector, adopts the habit when he thinks he has a grievance against an agent or an executive officer to confide in the missionary. The latter listens to him, helps him according to his means, and makes himself the echo of all the complaints of a region. Hence the astounding influence which the missionaries possess in some parts of the territory. It exercises itself not only among the natives within the purview of their religious propaganda, but over all the villages whose troubles they have listened to. The missionary becomes, for the native of the region, the only representative of equity and justice.[b] He adds to the position resulting from his religious zeal the influence which in the interest of the state itself should be secured to the magistrate.

THE ACCUSING RECORD OF ADMINISTRATIVE INDIFFERENCE TO THE RIGHTS AND INTERESTS OF THE NATIVE PEOPLES.

A decree of the King-Sovereign of December 5, 1892 (not published in the Bulletin Officiel) directs the secretary of state "to do whatever he may deem necessary or practicable to insure the exploitation of the Domaine Prive."

For a long time (i. e., until November, 1903) the administration believed it could derive from this (decree) the right to make assessments, and also to delegate this privilege to companies, without any specification as to the nature or amount of the tax or even the degree of force that might be employed to secure it.

Under date of November 18, 1903, the King-Sovereign issued a decree fixing a uniform law of taxes for the entire State. So far as relates to the natives, the substance of this law is as follows: Every adult native who is in good health is subject to assessment, to consist of labor for the State. The maximum amount during any one month is forty hours of actual labor, and the work is to be paid for; this remuneration to be not less than the actual wages paid in the neighborhood.

In only a few of the districts had this law been put into effect up to the time of the coming of the commission.

A circular of the governor-general on February 29, 1904, announces to the district commissioners that the effect of enforcing the new law (of November, 1903) regarding assessments must be not simply to maintain the results of previous years, but to show a constant increase in the revenues.

Presented in a form so absolute these instructions were bound, in the majority of cases, to prevent the district commissioners from reducing impositions that were excessive by establishing new returns. And, indeed, many of them contented themselves with reenforcing the amount of the preceding taxes.

Does the Government intend by this that agents should merely seek to increase the number of enrolled contributors in proportion as under peaceful rule, the territory should become more accessible and the natives more amenable to taxation?

Article 54 (of the King's edict of November, 1903) states that in lieu of seizable property forced labor may be demanded. But how shall this be done? Shall one put a native in chains and inflict corporal punishment? How long may he be imprisoned and to what labor shall he be put? It is true that interpretative circulars have fixed one month as the maximum term of detention at hard labor, but it is evident the regulation is still left subject to the judgment of the agents.

No restraint was placed upon the agents as respects the manner of their conformity to the official standard.

The law of November 18, 1903, does not adequately decide in the question as to compulsory measures.

The law of the Free State has never defined what is to be understood by the term 'land occupied by the natives.'

The law requires payment of the local rate of wages as the minimum, but the circular of February 29, 1904, seems to indicate that it shall be the maximum.

The same lack of definiteness prevailed as regards the means of compulsion, when necessary to use this for nonpayment of taxes. The agents, like all the rest, followed no rule.

A law ought to indicate clearly what officials can declare the operations of war, decide conditions under which they may be undertaken, and the form they shall assume. Then one will know certainly when he is under the empire of the common law of the State and when he should bow to martial law.

It is true to say in general that everything regarding prescription and assessments as relates to the natives, until the last years, was left to the judgment of the agents.

We must say that the agents were not properly cautioned against these excesses.

In this great concession (the Abir) there was only one state agent, the commandant of the police force stationed at Basankusu. Although having legal duties and powers, he has never reported to the superior officers any illegal acts occurring in his district. His rôle has always been restricted to quelling native revolts or to bringing refractory villages back to work. We are justified in believing that he thought he had no other mission to fulfill for the instructions given him as read by us relate always to these matters.

(Official) infractions of law in the exercise of force have but rarely been brought to the courts.

LIMITATIONS OF THE COMMISSION'S FUNCTIONS.

The commission has not deemed the determining of personal responsibility to be the object of its inquiry.

We will not enter upon the question of the freedom of trade in its relation to the Berlin act. Such an inquiry would take us beyond the limits set for us.

A CHARACTERISTIC DECLARATION OF THE KONGO GOVERNMENT.

These ideas (embodied in the commission's report) are the same already expressed by the secretaires-general in their report to the King-Sovereign on the 15th of July, 1900. It is there stated that the plan followed by the Government "is to exploit the private domain solely by the voluntary contributions of the natives, the inducing motive to work being a just and adequate remuneration."[a]

DOCUMENT C.

Testimony at hearings of the commission.[b]

BWEMBA—STATION OF THE AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.

Mr. Billington made a statement dealing chiefly with forced labor, the tying up of men and women, etc., confirming the report sent by him to his mission headquarters in Boston, which were embodied in the memorial presented to Congress in April, 1904.

BOLOBO—STATION OF THE ENGLISH BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Mr. Grenfell, who has been cited frequently as an upholder of the present régime, a contention based apparently upon statements made by him some years ago, before he became personally acquainted with the present state of affairs on the upper river, expressed to the commissioners his disappointment at the failure of the Kongo government to realize the promises with which it inaugurated its career. He declared he could no longer wear the decorations which he had received from the sovereign of the Kongo State. He stated that the evils from which the country was suffering were due to the haste of a few men to get rich, and the absence of anything like a serious attempt to properly police the country in the interests of the people. He instanced the virtual impossibility of a native obtaining justice owing to witnesses being compelled to travel long distances either to Leopoldville or Boma.

Mr. Scrivener dealt with the appalling condition of affairs he discovered in King Leopold's special reserve, the Domaine de la Couronne, during his 150-mile journey through that district in 1903,[c] and brought forward a number of native witnesses in proof of his statement. Lieutenant Massard, one of the officials implicated, from whom the press published last year a letter attacking Mr. Scrivener, was subsequently arrested.[d]

In the course of the examination the commissioners asked a rather youthful witness: "How is it you know the names of the men who were murdered?" "One of them was my own father," was the unexpected reply. "Men of stone," wrote Mr. Scrivener, "would be moved

[1] M. J. M. Jennings, who served for many years as a magistrate under the government of the Kongo State, spoke as follows in an address at Verviers a few weeks since:

"The Kongo judiciary is subservient to the governor-general, who at any moment can remove the judges and assistant public prosecutors; it is therefore powerless to suppress abuses. * * * The entire organization of the judicial department depends upon the administrative authorities. * * * A white man can not be summoned before the courts without an authorization from the governor-general. If a magistrate wishes to travel, he must apply to the district commissioner for food, canoes, and carriers. If he is not on good terms with that official, he will get bad and insufficient food, weak carriers, etc. Once a Liege magistrate, who was not on good terms with the executive official of the district, received for four months' journey a defective canoe, 2 pounds of flour, and a pot of butter. A magistrate will therefore exercise wise discretion before coming into conflict with an official. * * * A circular issued in 1904 states that when a magistrate is about to investigate abuses he must place all the facts before the executive administrator of the district. As three times out of four the guilty parties have merely carried out the orders of that very official, whom they know to be interested in the affair, the kind of task which the magistrate has to perform is to be imagined. His task can indeed be rendered impossible by the executive official. As the magistrate, furnished with the barest necessities, makes his way to the scene of the outrages he proposes investigating, the executive official will dispatch fleet messengers to the guilty party, and when the magistrate arrives at his journey's end he can find no witnesses, and inquiry becomes impossible. The magistrate, say the natives, is the small judge; the executive official the great judge."

[2] With this may be compared a paragraph (relating to another section of the vast state) found in the memorial of missionary societies to Congress, April, 1904:

"A white officer, unacquainted with the missionary whom he was addressing, after a cruel raid jokingly remarked that he had killed many people and secured a fine lot of curios. He said that while his soldiers were firing upon the villages the people ran wildly about crying, 'Sheppite, Sheppite.' It was their name for Rev. W. H. Sheppard, the associate of Mr. Morrison, whom they were beseeching to come to their aid."

[a] Compare with this, for example, the commission's findings as to systematic universal employment of force, p. 26.

[c] For Mr. Scrivener's report of the journey see Memorial of Missionary Societies to United States Senate in Senate Document No. 282, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, pages 51, 52.

[d] A number of witnesses produced by Mr. Scrivener in connection with the trial of Lieutenant Massard were sent to Boma in December, 1904. On May 10, 1905, they had not yet returned to their homes and families. Witnesses sent to Boma from Baringa—1,000 miles away—in August, 1904, did not return until April, 1905, several of the party having died in the interval.

by the stories that are being unfolded as the commission probes into this awful history of rubber collection."

In the course of his testimony Mr. Scrivener said: "Not only are the natives often obliged to go several days' march into the forests to collect the rubber, but they are also compelled to all go to the government station, which is sometimes a great distance away, to each carry strips of rubber which, all told, sometimes weigh actually less than the sticks on which they are tied for carriage. The natives who collect rubber impositions should only be required to furnish them quarterly, and the transport should be limited to the number of men necessary to effect it instead of compelling all the men to undertake long and useless journeys."

"You mentioned that five natives were placed in single file and killed with a single shot by Lieutenant Massard, or by his orders. Among the witnesses you are able to produce, are there any who can testify to this incident?"

"No; I do not know of any. The fact itself I had from M. Dooms.[a] He received me very hospitably. During the whole of the meal we partook of together he spoke of nothing but the horrors he had heard of. Upon my return from the lake I saw M. Dooms again, and he gave me the account of the murders committed by Massard, or by his orders—shooting the natives as they brought in the rubber, or placing them one behind the other and driving one bullet through the lot.

"I expressed my surprise to M. Dooms that he should not have brought to the knowledge of the judicial authorities the facts with which he acquainted me. He replied that it was useless to do so now, and that he would expose them when he got back to Belgium. He also intimated to me his desire to leave the State service, because he did not like having to compel the natives to work beyond their strength. I had been waiting for the revelations of M. Dooms, and when I saw that their appearance was being delayed I gave publicity to the facts which had been revealed to me."

Seventeen native witnesses were then examined by the commission. Each testified to murders and massacres committed by white men and their agents.

LULANGA—STATION OF THE KONGO BALOLOLO MISSION.

Mr. Gilchrist's testimony: "They asked me to tell them all I knew about the La Lulanga. They prefaced my remarks by saying: 'Of course you know that this company is in the free-trade territory of the State?' They smiled when they said this, and so did I. I gave them instances that showed how free (!) it was. Just a few days before I had met a number of men of Bokotola, who, with their neighbors, were living in the forest, with all its discomforts and exposure in a wet season like the present, rather than stay in their own village and be harassed and abused by the company's agents. I informed them also of the sentry régime, with all its cruel accompaniments, and of what Mr. Bond and I had seen on our way from the Ikelemba, of their slave driving in those towns contiguous to their headquarters at Mompoko. I also told them what we had seen of the desolation in all the districts; of the butcheries wrought by the white men of the State and companies who had from time to time been stationed there. Everywhere the people were compelled to serve the companies in rubber, gum copal, or food. At one place two men arrived just as we were leaving with bodies covered with marks of the chicotte given by the trader of Bosci because their quantity was short. * * * Given favorable conditions, particularly freedom, there would soon be a large population in these interior towns."

Q. "What do you regard as causes of depopulation?"

A. "(1) Sleeping sickness. This has never appeared in epidemic form in our district; only in isolated cases.

"(2) Smallpox. Very few have died of this sickness.

"(3) Unsettled condition of the people. The older people never seem to have confidence to build their houses substantially. If they have any suspicion of the approach of a canoe or steamer with soldiers they flee.

"(4) Chest diseases, pneumonia, etc. The people flee to the islands, expose themselves to all kinds of weather, contract chills, which are followed by serious lung troubles, and die. For years we never saw a new house because of the drifting population. They have a great fear of soldiers.

"(5) Want of proper nourishment. I have witnessed the collecting of the State imposition, and after this was set aside the natives had nothing but leaves to eat.

"(6) Excessive taxes. The forty hours' work supposed to be given to the State is entirely a misrepresentation of the facts. The collecting of firewood alone occupies more than that time. That is sufficient without any other imposition.

"(7) Another thing that may account for the decreasing population is the constancy of the taxation. This sours the people. They feel they have no interests of their own."

BARINGA—STATION OF THE CONGO BALOLO MISSION.

[This territory is controlled by the A. B. I. R. Concessionaire Society.]

Mr. Harris gives the following account of the hearing at this station:

"Specific atrocities during 1904 were dealt with; then murders and outrages, including cannibalism; then the destruction of the Baringa towns and the partial famine that resulted. Next followed the irregularities during 1903. I drew attention to the administration of M. Forcie, whose régime was a terrible one, including the murder of Isekifasu, the principal chief of Bolima; the killing, cutting up, and eating of his wives, son, and children; the decorating of the chief houses wth the intestines, liver, and heart of some of the killed.

"Following this I came to M. Tagner's time, and stated that no village in the district had escaped murders under this man's régime. Next I spoke of irregularities common to all agents, the public floggings of practically any and every one; quoting, for instance, seeing with my own eyes six Ngombe men receive 100 strokes, each delivered simultaneously by two sentries. I referred to the imprisoning of men, women, and children, all herded together in one shed, with no arrangement for the demands of nature. I showed that very many, including even chiefs, had died either in prison or immediately on their release.

"I next spoke of the indiscriminate fines and the taxes imposed even on the food of the people and pointed out that the murders and cannibalism of the sentries were only an exaggeration of their general conduct. Then I spoke of the difficulties faced by the natives in reporting irregularities, as they have first to ask permission of the rubber agent. Here I quoted the sickening outrage on Lomako. (The details are unfit for printing.)

"I then pointed out that we firmly believe that but for us these irregularities would never have come to light. The relations that are at present necessary between the A. B. I. R. and the State render it highly improbable that the natives will ever report irregularities. The A. B. I. R. can and do impose on the missionaries all sorts of restrictions if we dare to speak a word about their irregularities. I quoted a few of the many instances which found their climax when Mrs. Harris and I almost lost our lives for daring to oppose the massacres by Van Caelcken. I stated that we could not disconnect the attitude of the State in refusing us fresh sites for missionary work with our action in condemning the administration. We are not allowed to extend the mission, and, further, we are forbidden to trade even for food, though all this is in clear violation of the Berlin act. So far as we are aware, until 1904 no single sentry had ever been punished by the State for the many murders committed in this district.

"Sixteen Esanga witnesses were questioned one by one. They gave clearly the details of how father, mother, brother, sister, son, or daughter were killed in cold blood for rubber. Then followed the chief of all Bolima, who succeeded Isekifasu (murdered by the A. B. I. R.). He stood boldly [a] before all, pointed to his twenty witnesses and placed on the table 110 twigs, each twig representing a life for rubber. 'These are chiefs' twigs,' he said, 'these are men's, these shorter are women's, these smaller still are children's.' He said that the white man fought him, and when the fight was over handed him his corpses, and said: 'Now, you will bring rubber, won't you?' To this he replied 'Yes.' The corpses were cut up and eaten by M. Forcie's fighters. He told how he had been chicotted and imprisoned, and put to the most menial labor by the agent, of numbers of stolen and ravished wives, and of the many anklets, spears, shields, etc., that he has been forced to give the sentries.

"Bonkoko told how he accompanied the A. B. I. R. sentries when they went to murder Isekifasu and his wives and little ones; of finding them peacefully sitting at their evening meal; of the killing as many as they could, also the cutting up and eating of the bodies of Isekifasu's son and his father's wives; of how they dashed the baby's brains out, cut the body in half, and impaled the halves.

"Again, he told how, on their return, M. Forcie had the sentries chicotted because they had not killed enough of the Bolima people.

"Longoi, of Lotoko, placed eighteen twigs on the table, representing eighteen men, women, and children murdered for rubber. Lomboto shows his mutilated wrist and useless hand maimed by the sentry. Isekansu shows the stump of a forearm, telling the same pitiful story. Every witness told of floggings, rape, mutilations, murders, imprisonments, and of illegal fines and irregular taxes, etc. The commission endeavors to get through this slough of iniquity and river of blood, but finding it hopeless, asked how much longer I could go on. I told them I could go on until they were satisfied that hundreds of murders had been committed by the A. B. I. R. in this district alone. I stated that witnesses only awaited my signal to appear by the thousand.

"I further pointed out that we have considered about 200 murders only from the villages of Bolima, Esanga, Ekerongo, Lotoko; that by far the greater majority still remain. Every one saw the hopelessness of trying to investigate things fully. To do so, the commission would have to stay here for months."

Mr. Stannard's testimony: "Not more than a tithe of the witnesses were examined, but that was because the commissioners considered the charges against the A. B. I. R. fully proved. The director of the A. B. I. R. had every opportunity of disproving the evidence, but the utmost he could do was to attempt to explain away things and plead ignorance. I said I wished to confirm all Mr. Harris's evidence, except the things that he had actually seen and I had not. I pointed out that we had together drawn up the evidence to be laid before the commission, so as to avoid repetition.

"Whilst I was stationed at Bongandanga they always had women prisoners, this being part of the ordinary routine of the A. B. I. R.

"Women were imprisoned because the men were short in their supplies. If a certain village or certain villages were short, a number of the women from those places would be seized and put into prison until the men made up their deficiencies.

"I spoke of the method of bringing in rubber workers by sentries. Every fortnight these people were brought in from their villages, distant about 30 to 40 miles. Before reaching the A. B. I. R. they had to pass through the Mission Station. In the front came a line of five or six sentries abreast, marching military fashion, with rifles or guns across their shoulders. Following these came a number of prisoners tied neck by neck. After these came the men and boys carrying their rubber, with sentries amongst them at different intervals, and then a number of sentries at the rear hurrying up the stragglers.

"I have seen rubber workers being carried away by their friends from the A. B. I. R. station after having been severely chicotted.

"When the police officer comes it is usually at the request of the A. B. I. R., and he is told only their side of this story. He hears nothing about the difficulty the people have in getting rubber and the terrible treatment they have received. The people think he has come to fight them and they either assume a hostile attitude or run away.

"The representative of the Kongo Government in the territory distinctly resented our action in reporting outrages connected with the procuring of rubber. The restrictions imposed upon us in the matter of foodstuffs, etc., are the direct result of this.

"With reference to taxation, I submitted:

"(1) It is wrong that all the taxes of a large territory should go to the shareholders of a commercial company.

"(2) Whilst it is right that natives should work, it should be shown them that there is some benefit from working.

"(3) The natives should work principally for their own good, whilst at the same time paying their taxes.

"The native evidence was overwhelming. The witnesses were so numerous that the commissioners felt it would be a tremendous task to hear them all, and they did not think it necessary, as they considered the charges more than proved. The director of the A. B. I. R. was asked what he had to say to these things, and he had to confess that he could not dispute the evidence.

"The witnesses from Esanga told how on one occasion, because forty-nine instead of fifty baskets of rubber were brought in, some of their people were imprisoned and sentries were sent to punish the people. One poor woman was trying to catch fish in a stream near by her village when she was surprised and shot by rubber sentries.

"Another witness told how he found the corpses of his mother, uncle, and sister killed by the sentries. All had harrowing stories to tell of the brutal murder of near relatives. Some had been shot before their eyes; others had fled to the bush to save themselves, and when they returned had found the dead bodies of their relatives lying about.

[a] M. Dooms was the successor of Lieutenant Massard. He told Mr. Scrivener he would denounce Massard's cruelties when he reached home. It was announced later that he had been killed by a hippopotamus.

[a] This word becomes pathetic as one thinks of what these natives had suffered from the pitiless power of their oppressors and of what they might suffer after the commission had gone.

"Defenseless women and children were shot down indiscriminately in order to strike terror and fear into the hearts of these unhappy people so as to force them to bring rubber. This has been the normal condition of these people's lives for years.

"Whilst the men were in the forest trying to get rubber their wives were outraged, ill treated, and stolen from them by the sentries. Usually the sentries would attack a village either at night or very early in the morning and in cold blood shoot down the defenseless people, who offered no resistance. The history of the A. B. I. R. in these parts is one of oppression, blood, and iniquity.

"Lontula gave a horrible story of massacre, mutilation, and cannibalism, crimes committed by those who were acting under the instructions and with the knowledge of white men. At one time, after they had killed a number of people, the cannibalistic fighters attached to the A. B. I. R. force were rationed on the meat thus supplied.

"Inunga, of Ekorongo, came with his bundle of twigs representing thirty-three people killed by sentries, and when asked why they had been killed replied 'because of rubber.' He mentioned four white men who had sent their sentries to do this dreadful work.

"Boali, a woman of Ekorongo, appeared before the commissioners, and her maimed body itself was a protest against this iniquitous rubber system. Because she wanted to remain faithful to her husband, who was away collecting rubber, she was shot in the abdomen, receiving an awful wound. She fell down insensible, and the wretches were not yet satisfied, for they then hacked off her foot to get the anklet she was wearing.

"Lonboto, her husband, told how they flogged him because he was angry on seeing his wife's mutilated body.

"Bomolo, chief of Bolumboloko,[a] said: 'There is no rubber in the forest. They search for it, but it is now finished. When they brought what rubber they could get to the station, they were flogged with chicotte, being laid on the ground.'"

BONGANDANGA—STATION OF KONGO BALOLO MISSION.

Mr. Ruskin's testimony: "I have been ten years upon this station, and during this time I have seen the following things:

"Expeditions of sentries armed with Albini rifles, followed by town people with spears and shields, they in turn followed by women with baskets for loot, etc. M. Peterson has led such expeditions, generally on Sundays.

"Large numbers of women in prison, compelled to work in the sun, some with children at the breast.

"In 1895 I visited the river Bolombo before the A. B. I. R. commenced operations and found large flourishing towns, people happy, and plenty of food, fowls, goats, etc. In 1901 the change was most noticeable. The natives were terrorized by sentries and had to live in the forest. In Bosinga and Eala, which were flourishing towns, I could not see a hut.

"In 1899 I saw poles at the A. B. I. R. factory to which four men had been tied, stripped, with heads shaven, for a day and night without water or food. In the morning their eyes were protruding, their features all swollen, and they cried for some one to bring a gun and put them out of their misery."

The commissioners handed to Mr. Ruskin Mr. E. D. Morel's book, "King Leopold's Rule in Africa," and asked him if the things reported there were those he was about to report. If so, it would save fatigue and time if he would confirm them wholesale. Mr. Ruskin read them and, with the exception of one or two typographical errors, confirmed the whole.

"With regard to the system, I have no hesitation in saying that it is iniquitous in the extreme, and if continued will end in the total depopulation of the country. The administration of the system varies with the agent, but the system itself remains the same."

Mr. Gamman's testimony: "After taking the oath I said that as soon as the approach of the commission was known the sentries ran into the village and compelled the men to return at once to their own towns. As soon as I knew that the commission had arrived, I sent to the town to procure witnesses, but they had all gone.

"The commission asked me if I could account for these things. I replied that it seemed to me that some persons were very anxious to get rid of all who could give evidence.

"The president asked what I thought was the reason of the deaths of those chiefs. I replied, lengthened and repeated confinement in prison, hard work, improper food, and, not least, broken heart.

"I cited the murder by sentries in the time of the agent, M. Baelde. In Boseki two sentries named Bolungia and Iseowangala tied up a man named Iseokoko to a tree and demanded from him 1,000 rods.[b] He was only able to supply 300 and one or two dogs. This, they said, was not sufficient. Because the rest was not forthcoming, Bolungia shot him dead. I gave the names of witnesses for this, but they were not called. I also informed the commission that Bolungia (one of the murderers) is at the present moment a sentry in the employ of the A. B. I. R. here.

"The president then asked me if I had any general statement to make. I thought the rubber tax was exorbitant. The rubber in the immediate districts was finished; nearly all the villagers had to go two days in the forest for their rubber, work five days there, and then return and bring the rubber to the factory. It was especially hard for those villages far from the factory. We understood that the tax was to be forty hours' work a month. The rubber tax for Nsungamboya was thireen days in every fifteen days. Thus the people only had four days a month at home. I knew of no village where it took them less than ten days out of the fifteen to satisfy the demands of the A. B. I. R.

"I stated that the greatest iniquity was the power put into the hands of untrained, armed sentries, who so frequently and atrociously abused their positions, and were never punished for even the most brutal crimes. As far as I know, not one sentry has ever been severely punished for their abuses of power, their seizing of wives and property, or even murder—cases which have been proved without any shade of doubt. In reply to a question by the President, I said I did not think it was possible to get in the same amount of rubber without the sentries, because it was excessive, and all power had been taken out of the hands of the chiefs.

"Continuing my evidence next day, I said that I thought I could prove that gross abuses of their position were still perpetrated by the sentries, and also that the sentries were not properly superintended by the A. B. I. R. agents. The women to whom I had referred the day before were tied up by Mbongedza purely for purposes of extortion—it could not have been for rubber—as the husbands were at the time carrying their rubber to Bongandanga. The names of the women were Nsala, Bokali, Ekokula, Botono. This was not even denied by the sentry, and although M. Delvin promised to revoke him, he was only detained one night, and he is at the present moment a sentry at Nsungamboyo.

"The number of women seized by the sentries from Nsungamboyo was almost innumerable. A young man gets the gun, is sentry at Nsungamboyo, and in a few months has quite a number of wives.

"Lokungu, my witness, was then called. He had a piece of string with forty-two knots, each knot indicating a person killed at Nsungamboyo. He also had a packet of fifty leaves, each leaf representing women whom he knew had been seized by the sentries; he could give the names of all, and there were many more whose names he could not remember.

"He had seen that day, in walking from our station to the steamer, four of these women in the house of a sentry; one was his own daughter. The names of these four women were Iysovu, Benteke, Bofola, and Boyuka. If a man is sick and can not possibly go for his rubber, his friends must give a substantial present to the sentry. If a male native down on the list as a rubber collector dies, his friends must do something handsome to get the name taken off the books."

IKAU—STATION OF KONGO BALOLO MISSION.

Mr. Lower's testimony: It was proved that a number of natives anxious to give evidence had been threatened, cruelly treated, and in some cases prevented from going to Ikau by native sentries.

Mr. Lower produced a long list of murders committed in the concession, bringing forward many native witnesses to prove the facts.

The names of sixty men, women, and children murdered by Government sentries were given, with dates and remarks upon each case.

A few typical instances are here given:

"Sentry demanded deceased's wife. He refused, was bound first and then tied to a post and shot. Corpse untied by Iseofoso, witness."

"Sent to secret prison. Beaten by sentries. Set free. Died one day later. The sentry Iseowaka demanded 1,000 rods before permitting relatives to have the body."

"Rubber deficient. Imprisoned. Sentries dug a hole and laid him face downward in it. They then jumped on him, ramming him with stock of gun until dead. They took the body to the white agent, who, without inquiring the cause of death, told them to take him away and bury him."[a]

"Bonkongya requested deceased to let him have his daughter. On refusal he sent two sentries, who killed him by hanging."

"The A. B. I. R. agent 'Lowoso' sent the sentries. The child Impogni had right hand and left foot and part of foreleg cut off for purpose of getting the ornaments which were on them."

"A woman was shot and her children were hacked with knives."

Testimony of Mr. Charles Padfield: "On 4th December, 1904, when the commission of inquiry was expected, the white agents at Boyeka endeavored to bribe the villagers to silence in the matter of atrocities committed upon the people. The villagers, knowing that the commission of inquiry was coming, refused to receive the blankets offered them.

"About September of 1904 the white agents at Boyeka sent a sentry to the village of Nkoli to get the rubber. Some of the able-bodied men of the town having died, several villagers went to the white agent, begging that the number of baskets of rubber demanded should be reduced from forty to thirty. This request the white agent refused, and sent the sentry Ekolelo to punish the people if the rubber was not complete. The people were unable to produce the full amount, and thereupon the sentry shot the chief, Bombambo, the charge entering the abdomen on the right side and passing out at the back.

"The son of the murdered chief, accompanied by another man, named Bosolo, took the corpse to the white agent (known to the natives as 'Ekotolongo') and complained. But he told them that the chief had been shot because the rubber was not complete, and ordered them to take the corpse back to their town. He called his dog and set it on them, the dog biting the son on the leg as he carried the corpse of his father.

"The town of Inganda had to produce twenty baskets of rubber per fortnight. On one occasion, in 1904, the people had only collected sixteen baskets. The sentry Maboke was sent for the rubber, and finding it short beat a villager so severely with his gun that he died. Lofali and other men carried the corpse to the white man, who said that the man had been killed because the rubber was short.

"Some time later the people of this village were five baskets of rubber short, and the sentry Mambuso caught a villager and took him to the white agent at Boyeka. The white agent thereupon ordered the villager to be chicotted in his presence. The victim of this brutality was then taken to Bassankusu (headquarters of the A. B. I R. Society), where he was kept five days, after which he was brought back again to Boyeka, again chicotted by the white agent's orders, and sent back to his home. His body was so fearfully lacerated that he died two days later. The villagers, led by the headman, Lofali, took the corpse to the white agent, who told a sentry to thrash Lofali with the chicotte, and to-day he bears the scars so received.

"The town of Bokenyola has to send ten women on Sunday and forty on other days to work at the factory. On one occasion, when the forty women had been working all day, the white agent, Lokoka, had the women in the evening all lined up, ordered them to strip themselves naked, and then * * *. (What follows is unfit for printing.)

"Early in 1904 the sentries of the La Lulanga Company were sent to Bolongo for the rubber due from that village. The people had gone to the forest, but had not been able to procure the full quantity. As a punishment three villagers were murdered and another wounded. The villagers brought the dead body of one of the murdered persons and also the wounded man to M. Spelier, the director of that society. He accused them of lying, and told them to return to the town.

"About the middle of 1903 the people of the village of Bomengi had started to carry the rubber overland to the factory, when a sentry, Engonda, arrived in a canoe. The people told him that the rubber was on its way, but he refused to believe it, and shot the chief. The white agent, Lokoka, declined to take any action.

"On another occasion the white agent, Lokoka, sent messages to the village of Bosokoli to inform the people that they would have to supply double the amount of rubber, adding that if they did not he would punish them. The people could not comply with the demand, and the white agent sent his sentries. They killed two men. The chief complained to the white agent, who said, 'No palaver,' and told the sentries to throw the bodies into the river.

"Some time afterwards the white agent, hearing that the chief was angry, instructed him to bring the rubber in person. When the chief came he was chicotted by order of the white agent and imprisoned for about four months, during which time he was made to work every day and frequently thrashed.

"In 1903, when the sentry attached to the village of Lobola had gone to the society's factory with the rubber imposition, the village was looted by other sentries. The people having remonstrated, the sentries shot four men, including the village chief; and, pursuing a boy, slashed him across the body and cut off his right hand. Two villagers went to complain to the white agent, 'Bomba,' taking with them the corpse of one of the murdered persons. The white agent told them to go away and put the body into the water.

"About the same time the people of this village, when taking their rubber to the white agent, Lokoka, were told by him to bring in addition ten fowls, sending a sentry to see the order carried out. The people objecting, the sentry shot a villager named Maloko. A relative took the corpse to the white agent, but he simply told him to go away.

"In the spring of 1903, while the sentry attached to the village of Busanbongo had gone to Mampoke with the rubber imposition, two other sentries came and looted the village of most of its possessions. Because the people objected one sentry shot the man Mokembe, while the other sentry shot the man Biacia in the right arm, which to-day he is unable to use.

"The women at Mampoko had to tread the clay used for brick-making, and on one occasion the sentries stripped the women, and in the presence of the white man in charge of the work * * *. The women went to M. Speller, the director, and he told them to go away.

"In 1904 the people of the village of Bokutolo received as pay for their rubber three flat beads. They asked for more pay, as they had not received anything for the last eight times they had brought rubber. For answers the white agents seized the man Mboyo and one holding him another beat him until he died.

"On the third occasion of their bringing in the rubber after the above murder, the white agents gave the people a small mirror. The people asked for money. As answer the white agents seized the man Bokectu and beat him with the chicotte so severely that he died. The eye-witnesses of these murders, and also of the widows of the men killed, were examined by the commission of inquiry."

MONSEMBE—STATION OF ENGLISH BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Testimony of Mr. Weeks: "The commission of inquiry arrived here on the evening of 6th January, 1905, and at 8.30 a. m. the following day the court assembled and I was summoned to appear before it. The court-house was the deck of a steamer—an ample space between two cabins. The president attended in a scarlet gown with lace bands, Baron Nisco in a black gown with white bands, and the Swiss member in a dress suit. Soldiers were on either side armed with guns, and with bayonets fixed. The court was dignified and impressive.

"After taking the usual oath I was called upon to make my statement. I drew the attention of the commission to the fact that my attitude toward the State was not the outcome of the present agitation in England, because I had written as far back as the 6th November, 1897, a strong appeal to the commissaire of the district of Bangala for a reduction of the taxes, as the people were in a state of semi-starvation, and the population was decreasing rapidly. I told them that three officers of the State came and investigated my complaints, found my charges true, but nothing was done to relieve the natives.[a] They accepted as proved my charges in re exorbitant taxation.

"The next point considered was that of depopulation. In 1890 there were over 7,000 people within a certain area, comprising the towns of Bongwele, Moluka, Mantele, Bonjoko, Mokobo, Nkunya I, Nkunya II, Bombala, Monsembe, the Creek towns, Upper and Lower Bombelinga; that the Creek, which had formerly 1,500 persons, had now only 67, and that out of the 7,000 people in the above towns we last counted 574, and that the State had just taken a census and found only 551, and that in the other parts of the district there is a like decrease. They accepted that as proved.

"I then referred to the killing of twenty-two men, women, and children by M. Mazy (Mabata) in the Bokongo section. They said that M. le Juge Grenade had fully confirmed my accusation and had supplied more details than I had given. Charge proved.

"Then came the question of depopulation through sleep sickness. I said that on my arrival at San Salvador in 1882 I found the people suffering from sleep sickness, that the people were not taxed, that they lived under normal conditions, that the birth rate kept pace with the death rate, and that the town had since increased. The first case of sleep sickness in Monsembe was brought to our knowledge in 1892—two years after our settling in the district—since which time the deaths have increased through semistarvation and worry. The eternal fortnightly tax depressed the people and made them an easy prey to disease of all kinds.

"We then reached the labor question.

"They asked if it was not necessary to force the natives to work.

"I said, 'No. Look at all the mission stations, steamers, etc., all built and maintained without the use of forced labor.'

"It had never occurred to them that all our work was done without the employment of forced labor. I called their attention to the industry of some young men within 50 yards of their steamers, who were making chairs and tables. As they were under our protection and knew they would enjoy the fruits of their labor they worked hard. Given a guaranty, I said, that the natives would reap the fruits of their toil and not be cheated out of them, they would work without force. The State could buy its native produce by giving a fair market price, dealing honestly with the natives and winning their confidence.

"I stated my conviction that State trading was the cause of most of the abuses, and that there would be no real reform until the State gave up trading; that the time and energy of the commission would be wasted unless the State abandons trading. State trading was the curse of the country and the ruin of the people. The promotion and perquisites of officials depended largely on the amount of rubber or other produce they collected from their districts. They could not administer the country while taken up with trading.

"In conclusion I said that we came here to teach and preach, and instruct in various ways the natives among whom we live. We are not political agents, and we care not a jot who rules the country, so long as we have freedom to do our religious work and the natives are treated fairly. But when we see them being crushed out of existence, what are we to do? Appeal to the Kongo executive? We have done that, and wasted our time, paper, and stamps. What are we to do? Sit quietly, because we are supposed to be in a foreign country? Why, the very stones would cry shame upon us if we were to be silent about the grievances of these people."

A SUPPLEMENTARY LETTER.

On January 5, after the commission had left Baringa, Mr. Harris wrote the president of that body:

"While you were at Baringa a chief from Boendo escaped from the sentries guarding his village and came through the forest in order to lay his case before you; but he experienced such difficulties that he arrived too late to see you, for he found, to his keen disappointment, that you had gone down river. He had brought with him several eyewitnesses of barbarities, also 182 long twigs and 76 smaller ones, which the chiefs of his village had sent you, in order to prove that the A. B. I. R. had murdered 182 men and women and 76 children in their village during the last few years. These people were killed by hanging, spearing, cutting the throat, but mostly with the rifle. Some of the women were tortured to death by forcing a pointed stake through the vagina into the womb. I knew of other such instances, but in order to test him I asked him for an example. 'They killed my daughter Nsinga in this manner; I found the stake in her.' He told me of many other instances of terrible brutality, torture, and murder. He further said that since he had left his town a messenger had followed him to say that the A. B. I. R. sentry, Lofela, had clubbed his wife to death with his gun."

Further details of tortures inflicted upon the people are too horrible for reproduction. Mr. Harris gave in this letter a long list of murdered people—men, women, and children. He concludes:

"This chief said that the reason why he was unable to supply more names of children was because they were too small, many of them being quite babies, who were killed with their mothers. I hope the commission will be able to find a place in its dossier for this letter."

AS TO PRESENT CONDITIONS.

On January 17 Mr. Harris wrote as follows to the vice-governor-general:

KONGO BALOLO MISSION, BARINGA,
January 17, 1905.

To his excellency the VICE-GOVERNOR-GENERAL:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your excellency's wish, expressed to me through His Britannic Majesty's acting consul, that we will not delay in informing the authorities of irregularities that we think ought to be known. During the last few months we have done this, but there is yet very much to be told; more than I can ever hope to deal with. I am sending this communication through Commissaire-General B———, in order that he may be fully acquainted with the facts.

I have just returned from a journey inland to the village of Nsongo-Mboyo, the incidents of which have so impressed me that I feel it wise to give you an account.

In the employ of the mission is a man who, as a youth, was captured in a native quarrel from this village, and, being anxious to know if his relatives were still alive, he has constantly urged this journey upon us.

Madame Harris and I left Baringa on January 8, arriving at Nsongo-Mboyo on January 11. I had heard much of the plenty and beauty of this village from my man, but arriving there we found nothing but desolation; there was the place where once the village had been; that was all. However, by sending forward scouts, I got to know where the people were, and after pushing on for another three-quarters of an hour, preceded by men shouting that we had not come to fight, I found the old chief and some of his young men; a little later the mother of our employee emerged from the forest. Then, your excellency, a sight appeared which moved us deeply; the employee, though a grown man, broke down and wept; naturally, one would have expected him to show pleasure at seeing his mother. I asked him why he cried. "Oh, Bondele,[a] how can I be happy? My relatives have all been murdered for rubber; my friends have not a house to live in, or food to eat; my sister, with her right hand and left foot off testifies to the brutality of the sentries." I had ample proof of this; there was not a house for us to sit in; the people were living in holes in the earth, hollow trunks of trees, and in little grass caves; many lived in the open, with a few leaves for a covering. The chimpanzee is better housed and fed than these people, and in greater safety, too. The old chief said: "White man, I am full of shame; I can not give you a fowl to eat yourself, or manioca for your men; I am ruined." The only present the mother of my employee could give her son was a few leaves for pottage. They had ceased working rubber, because they said they could not find it; and even when they took what little they could, the white men only flogged them; they were therefore waiting now, expecting that every day the white man would come again and kill them. The abject misery and utter abandon is positively indescribable; though I know of many villages that have suffered, not one that I know of has ever presented such a picture of hopelessness and despair.

A few months ago M. Pilaet took his sentries there and between them killed:

Men—Isekalokuji, Bofofi, Itoko, Ilumbe.
Women—Imengi, Bofua, Bokangu, Nkawa.
Children—Mongu, Iyoki, Bomambu.

The young woman Imengi was tied to a forked tree, chopped in halves with a matchet, beginning at the left shoulder, chopping down through the chest and abdomen and out at the side. It was in this way the sentries punished the woman's husband.

Bolumba, another woman, wishing to remain faithful to her husband, had a pointed stake forced into her womb, and as this did not kill her she was shot.

I found that, as in other towns, enforced public incest formed amusement for the sentries. (The names of victims and relationships are given.)

After spending some time with the people and hearing their miserable story, also seeing much proof with my own eyes, I made my departure, but before I came away one young chief stepped out and said, "Tell them (the rubber agents) we can not and therefore will not find rubber; we are willing to spend our strength at any work possible, but rubber is finished. Our mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, have been murdered in scores for rubber; every article of any value has been stolen from us, spears, knives, brassiets, fowls, dogs, etc., and we are now ruined; if we must either be massacred or bring rubber, let them finish us right off, then we suppose they will be satisfied."

[a] Mr. Harris's native name.

[a] Mr. Weeks's long series of disclosures to the Government have had the effect of proving once again how hopeless it is to expect that on the Kongo adequate punishment, or even punishment at all, will follow crime where white men are concerned, especially Government officials. In one prominent case in which shocking murders were committed by a force under Lieutenant Mazy, that officer was allowed to return to Belgium after the charges made by Mr. Weeks were in the hands of the authorities at Boma.

It was touching to see the old chief as he wrung my hand again and again. "Oh, Inglesia, don't stay away long; if you do, they will come; I am sure they will come, and then these enfeebled legs will not support me; I can not run away. I am near my end; try and see to it that they let me die in peace; don't stay away."

I was so moved, your excellency, at these people's story that I took the liberty of promising them, in the name of the Kongo Free State, that you will only kill them in future for crimes.

The following are the names of some of the people murdered by the A. B. I. R. for rubber: (Here follow the names of thirty-eight men, twenty-six women, and sixteen children, and of the sentries by whom the murders were committed.)

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

JOHN H. HARRIS.

On April 7 Mr. Stannard wrote as follows:

"The devil's work is in full swing again. The A. B. I. R. are determined to get their rubber from this district, no matter what it may cost in the shedding of blood and human suffering. The people have been told that very soon the sentries are coming again to kill more, and that if they do not bring in rubber they will soon be 'finished off.' Of course we shall report this to the State, but what is the use? Its action in regard to Van Caelcken's trial does not give much encouragement or hope that any real justice will be done."

August 19 Mr. Stannard writes again:

"They have also taken away the chief of Bolumboloko, who was tied by the neck, and Lontulu, the senior chief of Bolima. These are two of the most respected and influential men in the district, and their arrest and deportation are shameful. It is significant that they were two of the principal witnesses before the commission of inquiry. * * * Every important witness against the State is the object of the State's disfavor, and as soon as there is the slightest opportunity they are made to suffer.

"The fact is that for a man to speak of these atrocities, which should bring shame to any white man's face, is to make himself a marked man by the State with all that it involves.

"When the commissioners were here, they told us and the directors of the A. B. I. R. that the A. B. I. R. had absolutely no right to force the people to bring them rubber, and that it was illegal for them to do so, and yet now it is being done by the State itself, whose officers are working openly hand in hand with the A. B. I. R. in this abominable traffic. The commissioners said that some reforms were imperative and must be introduced immediately. But the reforms are as bad, if not worse, than the former condition. The commissioners said that extra judges must come into the district. The judicial officer is practically a nobody—he tells us that he can not do anything; that there are only certain things which come within his province for investigation, and that he has no power to act. The real judge, we are told, who has been granted special power, is Commandant H———, the man who, whilst police officer, was the tool of the A. B. I. R., and who is now helping them with his increased authority to do what the commission of inquiry pronounced an illegal thing, viz, force rubber from the natives at the point of the rifle. This is the kind of judge provided on the Kongo. In this country the judge joins hands with the lawbreakers, the plunderer, and the oppressor, and then sits in judgment on his victims. When these are the views and this the attitude of the executive and judicial authorities, where is there any room for hope?

"Lately there arrived in the Kongo a M. Rice,[a] who is said to be a very high official and large shareholder of the A. B. I. R., and to whom the greatest deference is shown by State officers. He says the State can not take away the charter of the A. B. I. R., and he has also obtained a promise from the commandant of the district to force the people to work rubber.

"On the 21st July he reached Baringa on an A. B. I. R. steamer, accompanied by Mr. Delvaux, the director of the A. B. I. R., and went up the river, their steamer being immediately preceded by another. Shortly after the director returned down river, and we were informed that M. Rice had remained at Mompona. Then on 11th August the A. B. I. R. steamer again arrived at Baringa with Mr. Delvaux, en-route for the Upper Maringa, accompanied by Commandant H———, with a body of soldiers. The general talk is that he has gone to fight the people and make them bring in more rubber.

"An armed sentry was sent round to the inland villages of this district telling them to work rubber. We are informed by the soldiers here that, on the return of the steamer from up river, their wives are to be sent down to Bassankusu, and they and their white men are going all round the country hunting the people and forcing them to work rubber. In the light of the past rubber-hunting expeditions and all the revelations made before the commission of inquiry, I leave you to imagine the scenes of bloodshed and the unspeakable horrors that are now about to be perpetrated upon the unhappy people in the far interior. And all this while the words of the commissioners are still fresh in the ears of the people, promising them that their sufferings were at an end! It would seem that the commission of inquiry was only intended to deceive the public, and give the men out here breathing time in their unholy work. Be it remembered that in this case it is the State itself which is opening this new chapter of horrors for the benefit of the rubber company.

"At one moment it is the company that is the tool of the State, whilst at another time it is vice versa, but it is useless to differentiate between them. For all practical purposes they are one and the same.

"A few months ago the director of the A. B. I. R. said that a commission was coming to examine the forests, to find out whether there was rubber and to what amount. It has come in the shape of Commandant H——— and his subordinate officers, with their respective companies of soldiers, who are to scour the country, carrying death and destruction in their train, in order to drive the people into the depths of the forest to search for rubber—for that substance which to the people has become synonymous with death. It is piteous to hear the natives plead that the rubber is finished, and ask to be allowed to bring meat or pay their taxes in some other way, but nothing will suffice except rubber. Some time ago there were reports that the State was going to take over the A. B. I. R., but that is no longer spoken of. But it would make no difference, for exactly the same system would remain, and what the State was able to pronounce illegal when done by the A. B. I. R. would be legal when done by themselves."

[a] Spelled "Rice" in Mr. Stannard's letter. From the description apparently M. F. Reiss, described in the official statutes of the A. B. I. R. Society as "commissaire" of that society.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF IOWA.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16014) to amend an act entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein," approved June 1, 1900, and all acts amendatory thereof, to report it favorably with amendments. I ask the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this report.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a local bill affecting one of the judicial districts in Iowa, and it is rather important that it should be passed without delay. It will take no time. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now. It is a House bill with amendments.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, to add at the end of section 1, line 2, page 2:

And the county of Appanoose, heretofore within said southern division, is hereby transferred to and made a part of the eastern division of the southern judicial district of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add as section 3:

SEC. 3. That all crimes and offenses against the laws of the United States committed within said Appanoose County shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined at the terms of the circuit and district courts of said eastern division of the southern judicial district of Iowa at Keokuk, in Lee County: Provided, however, That all criminal offenses committed prior to and all prosecutions begun and pending at the taking effect of this act shall be proceeded with and finally determined as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SHILOH ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16125) authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16125) authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon, which has just been reported by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I make this request because there is no opposition to the bill. It merely affords a mode of travel to visitors to that military park, which they have not now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. That appears to be rather an important bill, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey object to its consideration?

Mr. KEAN. I should like first to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, in response to the request of the Senator from New Jersey, I will say that this is a bill which has been reported favorably and passed by the House of Representatives, and it has been reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. It is designed to enable an electric traction company to extend its line to the military park at Shiloh. There are a great number of visitors going to that park, and the means of access to it are very difficult. The present road is quite insufficient, it being in a country where there is no rock. The object of the construction of this road is to afford facilities to people to visit that national park. The bill has been approved by the Secretary of War and also by the Park Commission. There is no opposition to it anywhere that I know of, and I do not see how there could be. It is a matter which ought to be acted on as soon as possible, because this road is now being built, and it is desired to go on with it. It is simply a license to the company to lay the necessary tracks.

Mr. KEAN. I will state to the Senator that this seems to be rather an important bill. It has just been reported this morning, and I think it had better go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection of the Senator from New Jersey, the bill will go to the Calendar.

Mr. MONEY. I hope the Senator will examine the bill and not make objection to it the next time it comes up.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5616) authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park and to operate electric cars thereon, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced a bill (S. 5665) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McLAURIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5666) to refund legacy taxes illegally collected; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DEPARTMENTAL INFORMATION AFFECTING MARKETS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a concurrent resolution, but before doing so, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to make an explanation.

Several weeks ago the House of Representatives passed a bill, H. R. 10129, amending section 5501 of the Revised Statutes. The Senate after receiving the bill passed it with an amendment and it went to conference. The conferees reported to each of the Houses among other things an amendment to add, after the word "thereof," on page 2, line 14, of the bill, the words "and every member of Congress." The report of the conference committee stated frankly that in the judgment of the committee this amendment was contrary to the rule of the two Houses because it had not passed either of the Houses. On objection by several Senators the report was withdrawn. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested that the matter could be cured by the adoption of a concurrent resolution authorizing the committee of conference to make the amendment to which I have called attention. In order that that may be done I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to agree to an amendment on page 2, line 14, of the bill, by inserting after the word "thereof" the words "and every member of Congress."

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it be read again.

The concurrent resolution was again read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I should like to suggest to the Senator who offers it that it would be quite as easy and, in my opinion, a good deal more regular to enact it as a law instead of passing a resolution giving instructions to the conferees. We have power to amend the existing law in this way if we see fit or we can pass an independent bill.

I do not object to the resolution, but, as a matter of propriety and regular proceeding in the Senate, I do not think it a wise course to pursue. Beyond that I do not care to say anything.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will simply say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, that on the consideration of this matter several weeks ago it was suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the amendment might be made in this way, and so far as I now remember no one in the Chamber (and I think the Senator from Colorado was here at the time) objected to that course. The suggestion apparently meeting the unanimous approval of the Senate, certainly of those present, by their failure to object, I simply pursued this course because I believed it to be in accordance with the general wish of the Senate on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the conference report on House bill 5976 be laid before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. He is not in the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on this question, he being necessarily absent from the Chamber.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 11, as follows:

AGREEMENT WITH LOWER BRULÉ BAND OF INDIANS.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 980, which has just come from the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 980) to ratify an agreement with the Lower Brulé band of the Sioux tribe of Indians in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell or dispose of the west half of townships 106, 107, 108, 109, and 110 north, range 77 west of the fifth principal meridian, and fractional townships 106, 107, 108, 109, and 110 north, range 78 west of the fifth principal meridian, and fractional township 110 north, range 79 west of the fifth principal meridian, the same being the western portion of the Lower Brulé Indian Reservation in South Dakota, comprising approximately 56,560 acres: Provided, That sections 16 and 36 of the lands in each township shall not be disposed of, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $1.25 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose: Provided further, That any Indians to whom allotments have been made on the tract to be ceded may, in case they desire to do so before said lands are offered for sale, relinquish same and select allotments in lieu thereof on the diminished reservation.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said lands, except sections 16 and 36 in each township, to be appraised by legal subdivisions, and when all of said lands have been appraised the same shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry at not less than their appraised value by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands shall be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged: Provided further, That the price of said lands when entered shall be that fixed by the appraisement or by the President, as herein provided for, which shall be paid in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry, and the balance in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry. In case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, promptly when due, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be reoffered for sale and entry: And provided further, That the lands embraced within such canceled entry shall, after the cancellation of such entry, be subject to entry under the provisions of the homestead law, at the appraised value until otherwise directed by the President, as herein provided.

When the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That the entryman shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within six years, but nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 3301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the appraised price, receiving credit for payments previously made; and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such entrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must have received their full naturalization papers: Provided further, That the fees and commissions to be paid in connection with such entries and final proofs shall be the same as those now provided by law where the price of the land is $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That when, in the judgment of the President, no more of the said land can be disposed of at the appraised price, he may by proclamation, to be repeated at his discretion, sell from time to time the remaining lands subject to the provisions of the homestead laws, or otherwise, as he may deem most advantageous, at such price or prices, in such manner, upon such conditions, with such restrictions, and upon such terms as he may deem best for all the interests concerned.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands aforesaid, exclusive of the customary fees and commissions, shall, after deducting the amounts of the expenses incurred from time to time in connection with the appraisements and sales, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the Lower Brule Reservation, and shall be expended for their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of South Dakota, as provided in this act, and for the necessary expenses of appraising said lands as provided herein: Provided, That the money expended in appraising said lands shall be reimbursable and shall be deducted from the proceeds received from the sale thereof.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make all needful rules and regulations as to manner of sale, notice of same, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and with authority to reappraise said lands if deemed necessary from time to time, and to continue making sales of the same, in accordance with the provisions of this act, until all of the lands shall have been disposed of: Provided, That all lands herein ceded and opened to settlement under this act remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold and disposed of for cash, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not more than 640 acres to any one purchaser.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein; or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands, or any portion thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over and expend the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received, as herein provided.

To strike out the preamble.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the sale of a portion of the Lower Brule Indian Reservation in South Dakota, and for other purposes."

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

WATER RESERVOIRS AT DURANGO, COLO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2188) granting to Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs, and the amendments were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12872. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and codify the laws relating to municipal corporations in the district of Alaska," approved April 28, 1904, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

STATUE OF GEN. NATHANAEL GREENE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall have to insist that we can not enter upon the unanimous-consent agreements for the consideration and passage of private or special bills. There are two Senators waiting to address the Senate, and I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the rate bill. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] can get his bill in a little later.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that this is a very short bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I give way to the Senator, some one else will want to get in. However, I will give way to the Senator, but I give notice that I shall surrender to no one else.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2072) to provide for the erection of a statue of Gen. Nathanael Greene on the battlefield of Guilford Court House.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the preparation of a site and the erection of a statue of Gen. Nathanael Greene on the battlefield of Guilford Court House, in Guilford County, N. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I now ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. President, the agitation for Government supervision of railroads has been prominently before the country for a number of years, and the people, in my judgment, without regard to section or party, are back of this agitation. In the earlier period of railroad development the people, through their holdings of stock and the liberal aid which was granted by the State, had an interest in almost every railroad enterprise. While that condition of affairs continued complaints against railroad management were few. When, however, railroads became profitable and the necessity for public aid no longer existed, they gradually passed under the control of corporations through various schemes of reorganization. As corporate control progressed, complaints increased. At the present time seven corporations control practically all of the railroads of the country, and no argument is necessary to convince a thinking man that this consolidation means the elimination of competition and the placing of despotic power in the hands of a few men. This monopoly of the transportation facilities and elimination of competition has brought about gross abuse of the rights of the public by the railroads, and it is the imperative duty of Congress to exercise its power to see that the interests of the people are protected.

I am not disposed to support the passage of any measure which will unjustly affect the railroads. The people demand nothing unfair. On the contrary, they realize that the railroads have been one of the most important factors in the development of the country, and that any enactment of law which would cripple them would be a grievous mistake. The greatest care should be exercised in the framing of a law intended to give relief to the people to see that no injustice is done the railroads.

I have followed the debates in the House and Senate on the pending bill with great interest. Such diversity of opinion exists as to the powers of Congress to deal with this question that it is difficult to reach a conclusion satisfactory to myself. I have grave doubts as to whether any legislation that may be enacted will prove effective in putting a stop to the unjust practices of the railroads. Their ability to circumvent the law will, I fear, be equal to the emergency. I am convinced, however, that they will not suffer injury by reason of any law which may be enacted, and I have little sympathy with the declarations made by their representatives that ruin will follow to them from the passage of this act.

Government regulation of railroads is not a new proposition. Many of the States have commissions which adjust and regulate rates on domestic traffic, and from 1887 to 1897 the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised this power. No injury to the railroads has been shown to have resulted from this supervision. On the contrary, during the ten years when rates were fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission the railroads made a net profit of about 8 per cent per annum, or 80 per cent for the ten years, and added 35,000 miles of road. The protest made by the railroads against the passage of any legislation on this subject is based, not on their fear of ruin, but on their greed and desire to continue to reap ill-gotten gain.

Mr. President, I will say here that if Congress had the power I would favor the creation of a commission of seven members, with full and final authority to fix rates and make such other rules and regulations as might be necessary to protect the shippers of the country. In my judgment such a commission, which should be composed of men learned in the law, of wide business experience, and knowledge of railroad affairs, would reach as nearly a just and impartial solution of railroad regulation as any tribunal to which the matter could be referred. It would have no interest, directly or indirectly, in the subject-matter of cases coming before it, nor would its investigations be limited by technical rules of law. All of the facts, conditions, and circumstances bearing upon the questions at issue could be gone into, and a judgment rendered which would meet the demands of justice and equity. I believe that such a commission would constitute a board of arbitration between the public and the railroads to which all their differences could be submitted and adjusted in the spirit of compromise to their mutual advantage. None of these advantages could be obtained by conferring jurisdiction upon the courts to adjust these matters. The judges would necessarily have only a theoretical knowledge of the questions brought before them, and would be bound in their judgments by a strict application of technical and sometimes harsh rules of law. What is needed at this juncture is common sense and good judgment, and not the mystifying and confusing distinctions of the law.

In the present crisis, when consolidation of transportation facilities has reached a climax, and when the people are powerless to prevent abuse of railroad power, it is absolutely necessary for the Government to interpose in the interest of the people. That can best be done by organizing a commission with authority and powers sufficiently elastic to embrace all the complex conditions that exist. The only hope for a proper solution of the problem is to deal with it comprehensively, and that can only be done through a specially authorized commission. So strongly am I convinced of the wisdom of this course that I would be glad to see the pending bill passed with an amendment distinctly forbidding any interference by the courts with the work of the Commission. It may be that such a law would be unconstitutional, but that question can not be decided until the Supreme Court of the United States shall have passed upon it. It is our duty as the representatives of the people to enact laws which seem to us to be wise and prudent, and which will give effectual relief when passed. We are the legislative branch of the Government, charged with the responsibility of carrying out the will of the people, and if that will, in this instance, can be carried out best by making the authority of this Commission final, it should be done, leaving to the court the responsibility of construing the law. Should it be held unconstitutional, it will lie in the wisdom of the people to say whether the law should be amended in conformity with the decision of the court, or whether an amendment to the Constitution conferring the necessary power upon Congress to enact such legislation, should be adopted.

If I am correct in my judgment that the organization of a commission with full and final authority to regulate railroads is the wisest and best solution of the problem, then it follows that the Commission should have authority to sustain and enforce its orders. Any restriction of that authority will impair the effectiveness of the work of the Commission, and I believe that it would be better to pass a law giving final authority to the Commission and let the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon it and then reach the situation as it may develop by constitutional amendment, or by modification of the law. It would be a matter of no great difficulty to secure the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution. Already the legislatures of twenty of the States have passed joint resolutions favoring the passage of stringent railroad legislation, and the innumerable petitions from all classes of the people clearly indicate that the public is thoroughly aroused to the necessity of Government supervision and control of the railroads.

I am led to believe, however, from the discussions that have taken place here and in the House, that we will be unable to pass the pending bill without providing for a review by the courts. This being true, we should pass the bill in such form as will as nearly as possible accomplish the desired end. It is of the highest importance that we should enact a law at this session of Congress. The people are demanding immediate relief, and, not being able to secure what I believe the conditions demand, I shall vote for the pending bill with such amendments as tend to throw safeguards around the work of the Commission.

The pending bill, known as the Hepburn bill, seems to me to embrace in the main all of the essential features needed in a bill of this character. It provides for the public inspection of rates, fares, and charges made by the railroads for the transportation of property and passengers; that all service rendered shall be reasonable and just, declaring unlawful any unjust and unreasonable charge for any service. It also provides that the railroads shall make an annual report and shall furnish to the Commissioners any information which they may desire; that the Commission shall have jurisdiction over private cars, elevators, refrigerators, terminals, private switches, and all other means and devices used by the railroads. Section 15 of the bill provides: That the Commission is authorized and empowered, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made under the provisions of the bill, it shall be of the opinion that the rates charged are unjust and unreasonable, or otherwise in violation of this act, to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable maximum rate to be charged in such case; to issue an order that the carrier shall put its findings in effect; and that such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force, unless suspended or modified by the Commission, or by a court of competent jurisdiction.

"Also, that whenever carriers shall publish and file joint rates, charges, etc., and fail to agree among themselves as to the apportionment or division thereof, the Commission may after hearing make a supplemental order prescribing the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto; and also, after hearing on a complaint, to establish through routes and joint rates as the maximum to be charged and prescribe the conditions under which the same shall operate; and also to prescribe the value of any service, directly or indirectly, which any owner of property transported under this act may render in connection with such transportation." It is provided in section 16 of the bill, "That for each violation of the orders of the Commission by a carrier a penalty of $5,000 shall be forfeited to the United States, and that in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense." Also, all necessary provision is made in the act for the enforcement and carrying out of the law.

Various points of objection are made to the bill and many amendments have been offered by Senators, but none of the amendments that I have examined, except that offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] disturbs or changes the main features of the bill. The Senator from Ohio is of opinion that Congress can not confer the power to fix rates upon a commission. If his contention should be sustained by the court, then the bill would be of no avail. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] urges that the bill should contain a distinct provision for a judicial review of the findings of the Commission, while the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] contends that, while such a review should be provided for, the power of the courts to issue interlocutory or intermediate orders, suspending the rate fixed by the Commission until after full hearing should be expressly denied. There seems to be a concurrence of opinion that the only question which the courts can take into consideration upon review of the findings of the Commission is whether or not the rate fixed is just and reasonable.

If the courts are to have the power to review the findings of the Commission, I am in favor of limiting that power by denying them the right to issue interlocutory orders. However, grave doubts as to the power of Congress to do this have been expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and other able constitutional lawyers. The main object which we should seek to accomplish is to prevent mere dilatory litigation on the part of the railroads. I believe that the penal provision of the bill, which fixes a penalty of $5,000 for each violation of the orders of the Commission, will have the effect of preventing an abuse of the right of court review. In other words, it seems to me that, having provided for an able commission, with full power to fix and regulate rates and with a heavy penalty for a violation of its orders, we have secured in the main all the features necessary to make this bill effectual. Not being a lawyer, and therefore unacquainted with legal decisions and distinctions, I am not prepared to discuss the legal phases of this bill. I will be satisfied with the action of the Senate in respect to these matters so long as the main features of the measure are retained.

I do not believe that the right of the courts to review the findings of the Commission, if that review be restricted to the justness of the rate, will impair the practical application of this legislation, provided a heavy fine is imposed upon the railroads as punishment for violating the orders of the Commission, either openly or by recourse to legal proceedings. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has expressed some doubt as to the constitutionality of this provision for a fine, on the ground that the fine provided for in the bill is so large as to practically prevent a review by the court. It seems to me, however, that this contention is not well founded, because no fine will have to be paid if the rates fixed by the Commission are found to be unjust and unreasonable, and the railroads can easily secure immunity from the fine by putting the orders of the Commission in force. But even this difficulty may be obviated by providing that the railroads shall put up a bond to cover the difference between the rate fixed by the Commission and that charged during the litigation. In my judgment, either of these provisions would effectually prevent any undue delay and unnecessary litigation. However, I am convinced that when a Commission, such as is provided for in this bill, shall have been organized and begun its work its decisions will be found to be so uniformly just to all interests concerned that no necessity will exist for further litigation, unless the object be to cause delay and to prevent justice, in which case a fine ought to be imposed.

Mr. President, the combinations of capital which now control the transportation facilities will not voluntarily relinquish their power to any considerable extent. In the absence of preventive legislation, they will continue in the future, as in the past, to wring from the toiling masses their hard earnings and to place increasing burdens upon our commerce. It is the people least able to bear it who, in the last analysis, have to pay the unjust charges fixed by the railroads. More than nine-tenths of our people are dependent upon their daily labor to secure the necessities of life, and in proportion as the price is advanced by excessive cost of transportation their burdens are increased and their opportunities diminished.

I hope that the pending bill, with such amendments as may be required to perfect it, will become law, and that by it relief may be afforded to the people without real injury to the railroads. Delay in the passage of this legislation would, in my judgment, endanger the prospects of its ever becoming law. Another Congress or President might not so truly represent the people on this question. We ought, therefore, to make the best of a favorable opportunity to place upon our statute books a law which is signally in the interest of a majority of our people and in line with our plain duty.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what has become of the Senator in charge of the bill. He was here a moment ago. I rise only to inquire whether or not it will be agreeable to him for me to present some amendments at this time. [A pause.] The Senator in charge of the bill has just been discovered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. It is the first time he was ever off duty since he has been a member of this body.

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way?

Mr. FORAKER. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] concluded his remarks, and apparently there was no one ready to address the Senate further on the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who had informed us yesterday afternoon, and also informed me this morning, that he would proceed this morning, and I was patiently waiting for him to begin.

Mr. FORAKER. I rose to inquire of the Senator whether or not it would be agreeable for me to offer some amendments at this time. Of course, it was a pleasantry I indulged in when I called attention to the fact that he was not at his post; but he was in such excellent company, being with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and no doubt hearing words of wisdom, that I ought not to complain.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will pardon me and will not accuse me of neglect when I was just waiting for him to begin.

Mr. FORAKER. I exonerate the Senator with pleasure. I have already said he never before was away from his post, so far as I have any recollection.

Mr. President, when, a few days ago, I presented an amendment prohibiting the granting of free passes there was some discussion on that general subject. Since then I have received a number of letters from employees of the railroads, protesting against their being denied passes over the lines of other roads than those on which they are employed. They have made a case so strong as to excite my sympathy, and I want to give notice to the Senator in charge of the bill that I desire to amend the amendment as I originally presented it by striking out, in line 5, on page 2, the words "over its own lines."

The effect of striking out these words will be, if the amendment shall be adopted, to give authority to the officers of the railroads to give a pass to the employees of any railroad, without regard to whether or not they are employees of their particular road. I think if there is any class of people entitled to consideration in connection with this general subject it is that class of people who take their lives in their hands, so to speak, when they accept that kind of employment. I am disposed to show to them every consideration we possibly can consistent with the establishment of a policy that will break up the objectionable features of the pass system.

I have had some other communications in regard to this amendment, on account of which I desire to insert, in line 6, on the first page, after the word "for," the words "the same or equally good accommodations, and;" so that the provision will read:

SEC. 3. That no carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person a greater or less compensation for interstate transportation of passengers than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person for the same or equally good accommodations, and a like and equally good service.

In that form I shall insist upon the amendment, and would be glad to have a vote upon it at any time that it may suit the convenience of the Senate to vote on amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have examined the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio and have no hesitation in saying that I think it is a very proper amendment. But I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks his amendment covers the case I shall state. I do not know how far the practice prevails in other States, but in the State of North Dakota it is the practice of the railroad companies once each year to invite and take from their homes in each county in my State to the agricultural college of the State from 50 to 100 farmers free of charge. The farmers are invited to join the excursion at a given point. They are taken to the agricultural college, where they are entertained by the citizens of Fargo, a city of twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants, and after two or three days there they are returned by the railroad companies without any cost to them.

Now, I ask the Senator if he thinks his amendment would cover that case. I do not care to vote for an amendment that would deprive the farmers of my State of the privilege they are enjoying in this respect.

Mr. FORAKER. The inquiry addressed to me by the Senator from North Dakota only illustrates the difficulty of dealing with this general proposition. I do not think the amendment, as I have framed it and as I have offered it, would allow free passes to be given or free transportation to be given to the people to whom he refers. As I understand, the people to whom he refers are farmers, and they are transported free of cost by the railroads to the agricultural college of the State, where they receive the benefit of education for a limited term—a week or such matter.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They are entertained by the citizens of Fargo, where the college is located.

Mr. FORAKER. The exceptions, according to the amendment as I now have offered it—and I shall ask that there may be a reprint of the amendment as I have changed it—are as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the free carriage of destitute or indigent persons, or the issuance of mileage or excursion passenger tickets, or prevent such carriers from giving free or reduced transportation to ministers of religion, or to the inmates of hospitals, eleemosynary and charitable institutions, or to prevent any such carrier from giving free transportation to any of its officers, agents, employees, attorneys, stockholders, or directors, or to the families of its employees.

Inasmuch as these people, according to the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, are transported as an excursion, the officials of the road would be authorized to sell transportation to them at a nominal price. They could not give it away; they could not make it absolutely free; but they could make for that particular excursion any kind of a rate, no matter how low it might be; a nominal rate. I think the amendment in the form in which I have it is as liberal as I can make it, though I would be glad to make it more liberal in order to include the class the Senator from North Dakota mentions.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before the amendment is voted on I will ask the privilege of offering an amendment to it which will include the class of cases to which I referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio as modified will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. I will send it to the desk in order that it may be so dealt with.

Before we pass from that I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he has thought it out enough to have an intelligent notion in his mind whether we shall deal with these amendments one after another at some early day? The point is this: If we are going to discuss all these amendments before we vote on any of them, those that are first discussed will be entirely forgotten long before we come to take a vote, because there have been, I suppose, fifty or sixty amendments offered here. I have offered a number, and I know that nearly every Senator has offered some kind of an amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. In reply to the question of the Senator from Ohio I will say that I thought I made my own views perfectly clear the other day. I do not believe it would be desirable or wise for us to undertake to pass on amendments in this way, because, as I said then, many Senators are busy on other matters; they are not thinking especially about these amendments; most of the discussion so far has been upon the legal aspect of the question; and in my judgment the wisest and best course for the Senate to pursue, if it wants to have intelligent action by Senators, would be to agree upon some time for the final vote, and then three or four or five or six days preceding that, on full notice to everybody, the Senate would take up the amendments, and under some rule of five-minute or ten-minute or twenty-minute speeches discuss the amendments and dispose of them after they are discussed while the arguments pro and con are fresh in the minds of Senators, and they can determine whether any given amendment is necessary or desirable. That is my own judgment. Of course the Senate will control this matter according to its own wishes, but whenever I make a request for unanimous consent to fix a date for a vote I shall incorporate in it some such provision as that.

Mr. FORAKER. That meets my view entirely. All I want is that at some time we shall take up the amendments as such. I have refrained from pressing any of the amendments I have introduced only because the time until now has been taken up with the general discussion of the subject, and I did not want to break in upon that kind of a discussion with these amendments, which can be better considered separately.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say further for the information of the Senator that I was informed this morning by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that he had not expected to make a speech to-day, though the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] had announced such to be the case. He thought he would speak to-morrow; and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] has just informed me that he feels that he will be able to go on to-morrow or the next day on the general subject. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] informed me yesterday that he would be prepared by Tuesday next.

So the general discussion on the varying phases of the bill will not be exhausted before Tuesday, if then, and probably by that time we may be able to get an agreement as to a time for voting; and this question of debating amendments and passing upon them while we are familiar with their character will be incorporated in the agreement—at least, I hope so.

Mr. FORAKER. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from South Carolina spoke of Saturday.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is already assigned, I believe.

Mr. LODGE. We have to be present, I suppose——

Mr. TILLMAN. At the services.

Mr. LODGE. At the laying of the corner stone.

Mr. TILLMAN. Only to-morrow and Monday and Tuesday remain for the set speeches that are already on deck, so to speak, or in sight.

Mr. FORAKER. I would rather postpone the offering of these amendments and the making of comments upon them until amendments are the special order, for I think Senators will then give more attention to amendments. Just now everybody is giving attention to the general subject.

But inasmuch as no one wants to address the Senate I will, if it is agreeable to the Senator from South Carolina having the bill in charge, present another amendment at this time and make some explanation of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course the Senator has no need to get any permission from me, because it is perfectly agreeable to me to hear him always. He always speaks with such force and eloquence that I enjoy him very much.

Mr. FORAKER. I only meant in the sense that I was not conflicting with any purpose the Senator might have in view with respect to the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make a single suggestion with reference to dealing with amendments. It seems to me, in order to avoid complication in voting on amendments, it might be wise to take up the bill and consider it by sections, so that one section can be taken up and amendments to that section may be offered and disposed of, and so with the next section.

Mr. FORAKER. I think that is a good suggestion, and it is entirely agreeable.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to make the suggestion.

Mr. FORAKER. That does not conflict with what I have in view now.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand. I merely wished to make the suggestion.

Mr. FORAKER. The amendment I now offer is an amendment adding a section to the bill. It does not conflict with any provision in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. The only remark I wish to make is that all these suggestions as to methods of procedure are, I suppose, in a certain sense premature. When that matter is up we will consider them carefully.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no agreement being attempted.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have a statement from the Chair as to what the rule of the Senate is in considering the bill. My view of it is that suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that the rule of the Senate requires that when a bill is taken up for consideration it shall be considered by sections, and disposed of section by section; that all amendments relating to a particular section shall be considered, and then the section is passed over and we take up the next section. That is the rule of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that to be the general practice.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the rule of the Senate. I want to say that in this matter I intend to object to any departure from that rule. If I am here, I shall object to any unanimous-consent agreement that seeks to set aside that rule.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not hear what the rule is to a departure from which the Senator from Alabama says he will object.

Mr. ALDRICH. I submit to the Chair the suggestion that there is no rule of the Senate which provides for the treatment of amendments. The mode of procedure has usually been fixed by unanimous consent from time to time on different bills. I think there is no rule of the Senate on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The method suggested by the Senator from Alabama is according to the usual parliamentary practice, as the Chair understands.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; but there is no rule of the Senate on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no written rule, but it has been sanctioned by practice.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been sanctioned by practice to such an extent that I am justified in objecting to any departure from it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But there is no rule.

Mr. FORAKER. When the time comes we can no doubt agree as to how the amendments shall be disposed of.

The amendment to which I now call the attention of the Senate and which I shall offer, as I have already stated, as an additional provision to be attached at the end of this bill, is an amendment which provides an alternative remedy as against these evils. It provides, Mr. President, that when a complaint is made before the Interstate Commerce Commission, the shipper, if he be the complainant, or a community, if it be the complainant, may elect to proceed under this provision instead of under the provision of the Hepburn bill, if we enact it into law.

This is a proceeding that will be had in the courts altogether. That there is a necessity for some such proceeding as this being provided for at the present time is made more and more plain to my mind by every Senator who addresses the Senate. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER], who concluded his remarks only a moment ago, said, in concluding, that the bill was not according to his liking; he would be glad to have it amended; and in some amended form, although he might not like it, he was going to vote for it. And so it was in the House of Representatives. When the committee reported this bill they took care to say that it was probably not satisfactory to any member of the committee that reported it favorably. It is common knowledge that the so-called "Hepburn bill," if it be enacted into law, will not meet entirely the views of more than a few Members of the House or members of the Senate; perhaps it will not entirely meet the views of anybody.

While there is that diversity of opinion as to what this legislation should be, there is no difference of opinion, Mr. President, on the point that if we enact the Hepburn bill or any measure like it, without amendment, we will necessarily encounter a great many constitutional and legal questions. I am not going to speak about them now, because I have done that on another occasion at length. But I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Hepburn bill raises, in the first place, a question as to whether or not Congress has power to fix rates at all. Senators may say that this is not a serious question, but I think it is. I think the Supreme Court took pains to advise us that it is an open question upon which it does not regard itself as having expressed an opinion, and that in so recent a case as the Northern Securities case.

It will raise also—if that point be passed safely when this bill becomes a law and is put to the test in the courts, as no doubt it will be sooner or later—the question whether, under this bill as it is drawn, as it passed the House, as it was reported from the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, as it stands down to this moment, does not delegate legislative power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course I do not know how it may be amended in that particular; it is possible that it will be so amended as to obviate that question; but it seems to me it is impossible to obviate it, and it is a serious question which we should avoid, if we possibly can, by legislating upon this subject.

Then, in addition to those questions, the bill will raise the question, if it becomes a law and be put into operation, as to port differentials; whether the Commission can, if the rates over any road to any one of the Atlantic ports of entry be challenged, maintain as against that challenge the difference in rates which confessedly has been made only to overcome the natural advantages of the port of New York as compared with the port in whose favor the differential in question is made.

It will raise another very important and, I think, most serious question, as to whether we can constitutionally empower the Commission in the way it is proposed to empower it, to establish through routes and make joint rates as to railroads that can not and will not agree, but which are as separate and distinct as two individuals may be.

Then there is another serious question arising because of the penalties provided in this bill, and another because of the elimination, as I will term it, of jury trials in actions brought on awards of damages made by the Commission. I do not mean the elimination in express terms, for everybody will say that could not be done, but the elimination of jury trial by making a jury trial utterly impossible in the form of action provided for in this bill.

Then, in addition to that, I think a very serious question will be raised, if this bill be not properly amended so as to avoid it, as to the power of visitation which it undertakes to confer upon the Commission, to be exercised by it. As to these common-carrier companies, they being companies incorporated under State laws, I doubt the power of Congress, in regulating interstate commerce, to go further than the regulation of interstate commerce may require. I doubt the power of Congress, for instance, to require that a corporation organized under the laws of a State, engaged not only in interstate commerce, but also in intrastate commerce, shall keep no books, not even a memorandum of a transaction, except only such as the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe. I doubt the power of Congress to have anything whatever to do, except only to gather information for statistical purposes, with the business of a corporation that is confined wholly to a State.

Mr. President, there are other questions than these which will be raised. Some of them have already been very elaborately argued. Some questions have been raised also by amendments; but I am speaking only of those that the bill itself necessarily raises. I do not mention these questions for the purpose of now taking them up and debating them, for I have already heretofore done that. I only mention them to show that if what we have in view is not simply the passage of a rate-making bill, but a remedying of the evils that shippers are justly complaining of, we should avoid in legislating that which raises so many serious constitutional and legal questions, if we can, and we should, if we can, resort to some other method that avoids all of them.

I introduced a bill at the beginning of the session which I thought did avoid all of them. I have become satisfied, however, that that bill, in the form in which I introduced it, can not possibly pass; that a rate-making bill such as this is, or something like it, will pass and having reached that conclusion, I have determined that instead of insisting upon my own bill as a substitute for the pending measure, I will offer this amendment to be added to this bill. It is an amendment that is not in conflict with any provision of the bill. It is an amendment that amounts simply to a broadening and a strengthening of existing law. It is an amendment that not only avoids all these legal complications, but that avoids every question as to the practicability of the law. It is an amendment that involves, if we adopt it, the enactment of law that has already received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and about which, therefore, there can not possibly be any criticism as to its constitutionality, neither can there be—because experience has demonstrated it—any question as to its workability and entire practicability.

The amendment is merely of the third section of the Elkins law now in force. The amendment has been printed. If any Senator is enough interested to allow a page to hand him a copy of it, he will see at a glance just what is new matter; that it is very simple; that it is very easily understood. It is offered, as I said a moment ago, not to take the place of anything in this measure, but only to preserve and perfect in so far as we can the law now existing, the law in force, the law as to the efficiency of which men have testified without exception who have had to do with the regulation of interstate commerce; a law which the Interstate Commerce Commission has said in its official report is an excellent law, an efficient law; a law which every member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who was asked about it when he appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate testified was an excellent and efficient law and that it had accomplished great good.

In some remarks I made in the Senate on the 28th of February last I set forth at length these testimonials not only from the Interstate Commerce Commission acting officially in the making of its reports, but also testimonials given by witnesses who appeared before the committee, including the members of that Commission and including such distinguished representatives of the sentiment in favor of railway rate legislation as proposed in the Hepburn bill as Governor Cummins, of Iowa; Mr. Cowan, of Texas, and other gentlemen whom I might mention.

I am warranted, Mr. President, in view of the testimony I have already put in the RECORD, in saying that there has never been since the first interstate-commerce act of 1887 any legislation enacted either by the Congress of the United States or by the legislature of any of the States that has done so much to afford to the shippers of this country a remedy that was efficient and satisfactory in its character as the Elkins law, which we enacted in February, 1903. That law as we originally enacted it and as it stands to-day was designed to reach all the evils now complained of except one class of evils. It was aimed expressly by its terms at rebates, in whatever form they might be granted, and at discriminations by the carriers in their treatment of shippers in whatever form or whatever guise those discriminations might be allowed or practiced. When you have reached every form of rebate and every form of discrimination, you have reached every evil that has been complained of except only excessive rates. The Elkins act did not undertake to deal with excessive rates.

Mr. MORGAN. Will not the Senator from Ohio incorporate that act in his remarks and let it go into the RECORD?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; certainly. The entire Elkins law?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the entire act.

Mr. FORAKER. At the request of the Senator from Alabama, I ask that the entire Elkins law be printed in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask also that the amendment which I offered may be printed in full preceding the Elkins law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See appendix.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no criticism to make upon the Senator's eulogy on the Elkins law, and I have heard testimonials in favor of it that have been produced from many quarters; but I have not been able to find any actual evidence of the value of that law in dealing with any of the railway abuses with which we have been concerned. It seems to have been, so far as the Government and the courts are concerned, without a very extended application, so far as I can find out.

Mr. FORAKER. Permit me to call the Senator's attention to two or three cases, very celebrated among the cases that have been recently decided, where the litigation was conducted under the Elkins law.

I will first call his attention, however, to the case reported in 189 U. S., with which I know the Senator is entirely familiar, known as the Wichita case, where a suit was brought in equity by the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Missouri Pacific Railroad, at the request of Wichita, to enjoin a discrimination against Wichita, as the Commission alleged in its bill of complaint, the ground being that Wichita was situated on one of the lines of the Missouri Pacific, not on the same line, and less distant from the city of St. Louis than Omaha was, which was situated on another line of the Missouri Pacific, and yet the rate was more to Wichita than it was to Omaha.

That proceeding was commenced before the Elkins law was passed. There was some doubt about the jurisdiction of the court in the court below, because then the Elkins law had not been passed. But when the case reached the Supreme Court the Elkins law had been passed, and the Supreme Court held that the Elkins law took effect and was applicable to that case as well as to any other case that might thereafter be brought, and that the proceeding could be maintained under the Elkins law, and remanded it with that direction to the court.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, Mr. President, if anything else has ever happened in that case I have not been able to find a record of it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is aware of what happened. When the case went back the parties adjusted their differences, because here was a plain, unqualified remedy that the Congress of the United States had provided. The Supreme Court having upheld the law, and the way of the litigant being made plain and easy, they got together and adjusted their differences just as effectively as though it had been by a judgment.

Now, let me tell the Senator of another case. The Senator is familiar with what is known as the "Chesapeake and Ohio and New Haven coal case." That was a suit brought under the Elkins law to enjoin a rebate which was being granted and paid by the Chesapeake and Ohio on coal, which the Chesapeake and Ohio itself had sold to the New Haven road in the way the Senator is familiar with. The rebate was granted by making a difference in the price. That proceeding was commenced under the Elkins law, was prosecuted through to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the court had jurisdiction to enjoin that abuse; and not only to enjoin that abuse, but to enjoin the continuation of the Chesapeake and Ohio in the business of owning coal mines and trading in coal.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But I apprehend, Mr. President, that that suit could have been maintained under the original interstate-commerce law.

Mr. FORAKER. It was not undertaken under the original interstate-commerce law, and I do not think it could have been maintained under that law.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I notice that a similar suit was maintained against all the roads carrying packing-house products out of Kansas City some years before the interstate-commerce law was enacted.

Mr. FORAKER. That suit was commenced under the original law, but in the court below there was a most serious contention as to whether or not the court had jurisdiction, and whether it had power to grant the relief that was prayed for, and the Elkins law came to the relief of that prosecution just as it came to the relief of the other. Since the Elkins law there has been no question about the jurisdiction of the courts to enjoin proceedings of this kind. There is wherein is its great excellence.

Now, a few days ago we had another case called to our attention. A coal-mine operator in West Virginia made complaint that he could not get his fair allowance of cars; that he was discriminated against. He appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission looked into it sufficiently to have an opinion that there was ground for a suit. Immediately, under the Elkins law, it applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the railroad company to grant to this coal-mine operator a fair share of the cars. They alleged, I believe, it was entitled to 33⅓ per cent of the cars that were for the use of the mine operators in that locality. That was heard in the circuit court without delay and a favorable judgment rendered. It was taken to the circuit court of appeals and there that judgment was affirmed, Chief Justice Fuller presiding at the circuit and delivering the opinion, the prayer of the petitioner being granted, with this modification, that instead of allowing 33⅓ per cent of the cars they allowed 31 per cent, which they found to be the exact and proper proportion.

So I might go on if it were not, Mr. President, that the law is yet a comparatively new law and there has not yet apparently been much endeavor to put it into operation by those who are charged with the duty of enforcing it. But in every instance where the law has been applied it has proved, as I said, an efficient remedy and a prompt remedy.

But it yet has some defects. It applies, as I said, only to rebates such as were prohibited in the Chesapeake and Ohio and New Haven coal case, and to discriminations such as were alleged in the Wichita case, as I will call it for the want of a better name—the one I referred to a few moments ago. It did not undertake, as I stated, to deal with existing rates, and why not?

Mr. President, until long after this legislation was enacted nobody heard of any serious complaint about excessive rates. It was all about rebates. For years the shippers of this country have been complaining, and justly complaining, about rebates. Nobody ever made any serious complaint about rates being too high until this agitation commenced, and not then until in the very last months of it.

Rebates and discriminations have been the complaint, and justly so. When a shipper living in Chicago or living in Iowa or living in Cincinnati buys goods in New York, he not only wants a just and reasonable rate, but he wants, above all other things, to know that his competitor in business at home does not get any lower rate than he gets; and it is because he has not been able to know that, it is because this habit of making rebates has been practiced, growing out of the fierce competition to which the railroads were subjected, that the shippers have been making a special complaint about rebates.

Another class of complaint was about discriminations. A shipper did not want to be discriminated against by having a preferential rate allowed to his competitor or by having an allowance made to his competitor on account of a so-called "terminal road," or on account of an elevator charge or on any other account. The community did not want to have rates so adjusted relatively as that it would suffer in its competition with other cities in contending for a market that it wanted to supply.

So we had complaints about rebates and we had complaints about discriminations, but I never heard of a complaint about excessive rates, except now and then, perhaps, some exceptional instance was brought to our attention, until within the last two or three months.

So recently as last November the representatives of the railroad employees of the country called upon President Roosevelt and to him entered a protest against this proposed legislation on the ground that by a reduction of rates their wages might be put in jeopardy. The President said, in answer to them, that he did not think the result of the operation of the proposed law would affect wages, for he did not understand there was to be any reduction of rates, remarking in that connection that he had heard but very little complaint—perhaps he said, "very little, if any, complaint at all"—of that kind. I can not quote his exact language, but that is the effect of it, as every Senator here will remember.

Down I say, until that time there was no complaint about rates being too high. When a representative of my own home city of Cincinnati came here to testify before the Interstate Commerce Committee, a very intelligent and well-informed man on this subject—Mr. Hooker—he took occasion to say that in his long experience he had never known of excessive rates. Perhaps he used the words "extortionate rates." He said the complaint was not that rates were in and of themselves too high, but only that they were relatively too high as compared community with community, their particular complaint being that rates over the road from Cincinnati to Chattanooga and Atlanta and other points in the South are relatively too high as compared with the rates from New York and other Atlantic seaboard cities to the same common points in the South.

Now, Mr. President, it was because down until February, 1903, nobody had made any complaint about rates being too high, that we did not undertake to deal with that subject in the so-called "Elkins law." I know whereof I speak, because while I did not draw that law, while I do not know who did draw it, I did help to make amendments to it. I was on the subcommittee to which it was referred, and I remember that for weeks we were studying not only the provisions of that bill, but the whole general subject.

Mr. ELKINS. For months.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; for months, as the Senator from West Virginia suggests. We were studying it most conscientiously. We were hearing all who came, whether the representatives of shipping interests or the representatives of railroad interests, getting all the light, getting all the information as to what we should do with respect to it; and in all that hearing, from the beginning to the end, not one single witness ever told us about excessive rates. Go search the record and ascertain. It was all about rebates; it was all about discriminations.

Finally we came down with such historical incidents as all are familiar with, but to which I need not now refer, in our experience with this legislation, to the present session of Congress. In the House of Representatives they undertook to deal with this subject; and meanwhile, everybody having been induced to give attention to the general subject, we suddenly had three classes of complaints instead of only two. One was added. To rebates and discrimination were added excessive rates, and we commenced to hear and to discuss about excessive rates.

Well, we had gone over all that in the hearings the Senate committee had given last spring, and with the result that witness after witness testified—shippers and railroad men alike—that so far as they had knowledge there was no serious complaint anywhere of excessive rates. The trouble was about rebates and about discriminations, and all alike testified that rebates and discriminations were being broken up and put an end to by the Elkins law in so far as it was being enforced.

So the House took up this subject with a view of dealing with all these complaints, and they considered rebates in all the various forms in which they have been allowed, not only rebates granted and paid in money, secretly or openly, but rebates allowed by discriminations—by allowance for terminal roads, for elevator charges, for icing charges—rebates of every character and description that could be thought of. Every kind of a rebate that human ingenuity could devise was talked about, and discriminations of every character were testified about, and they considered them in the House; discriminations as to localities, discriminations by means of relative rates that were unjust. I should call attention to another complaint, that of rebates and discriminations by reason of a lack of uniformity in classification. They considered them all, and what was the result? They reported a bill, and in the report not only said, as I said a minute ago, that no member of the committee was entirely satisfied with the bill, but they went on to say that they had found it inconvenient to deal at this time with relative rates between communities, and so they had passed that subject over in silence; that they had found it inconvenient at this time to deal with the subject of uniform classification, and so they passed that over in silence.

As to rebates they did not say anything at all and did not put anything in their bill. They never mentioned them in any way, shape, manner, or form whatsoever, but so far as the classes of complaints we have been hearing so much about were concerned they confined themselves to excessive rates, and had nothing to offer to break up rebates, nothing to offer to change the wrong of unjust relative rates, nothing to break up and destroy discriminations of any kind whatever except only by excessive rates, and excessive rates, as I pointed out, was the least of all the evils that have been complained of.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Senator from Ohio understand that the bill as passed by the House makes no reference to rates that are unjustly discriminatory?

Mr. FORAKER. No; it does make reference to rates that are unjustly discriminatory in the sense that they are by comparison excessive rates. The Member of the House, Mr. HEPBURN, who had the bill in charge, the Senator will remember, took occasion to speak upon that subject, and others did. There was no common agreement there, and perhaps none here.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator would examine section 15 of the bill, he would notice that it deals not only with rates which are excessive—that is to say, unjust and unreasonable—but also with rates that are unjustly discriminatory.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, unjustly discriminatory as to what?

Mr. DOLLIVER. In any respect forbidden by law. It undertakes to deal with discrimination involving the relative rates between places by giving the Commission absolute command of the rate at the high point. I will add, while I am on my feet, that probably their failure to go elaborately into the subject of rebates and discriminations was because they shared the fine confidence of the Senator from Ohio in the law of 1903.

Mr. FORAKER. They did, undoubtedly, Mr. President, and that is exactly what I am coming to. I am pointing out with great particularity that, while it is true, as the Senator says, that the word "discriminatory" is used, yet the bill is so framed, as has been asserted over and over again, as to apply only to excessive rates; discriminatory as to what? There is not a word in the bill to show. Not discriminatory as to communities. They expressly say they did not undertake to deal with that subject. They said it in their official report, which I have a right, I suppose, to quote in this presence.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be glad to know the Senator's opinion as to the meaning of the words "unjustly discriminatory." Does that mean that when a rate, say, from New York to St. Louis, by the New York Central is less than the rate from New York to St. Louis by the Pennsylvania road, it would be a rate that was unjustly discriminatory?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have somebody who has authority, if there is such a person, state the meaning.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no authority. I am giving to this bill the interpretation those who framed it and brought it before the House of Representatives gave to it, and I am saying with respect to it that while it uses that indefinite term it does not tell us discriminatory as to what, but it can have but one meaning.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio is willing to allow the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to make a statement on this point.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I am willing, but I want to say "unjustly discriminatory," as this bill has been interpreted from the beginning, is a complaint that is referred to in the bill for which the remedy provided is a lessening of the rate that may be challenged as unjustly discriminatory because too high as compared with some other rate. That is what has been contended all the while. So you come back, in the case of an alleged discriminatory rate, to the question whether or not the rate that is complained of is too high as compared with some other rate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have tried to point out once or twice here that the bill deals only with complaints directed against a railroad or a joint route constituting a line of railroad. Of course it does not undertake to deal with the discrimination that arises from the fact that one railroad between two points charges a different rate than another railroad between two points. In fact, such a case is not imaginable in the present state of the business world.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me that it might be easily imaginable that one party might object to the New York Central Railroad, in the case to which I have alluded, charging much more than the Pennsylvania did for substantially the same service, say, from New York to St. Louis. If people who are suffering from unjust discriminations of that kind have no relief from this bill, as I understand the Senator now to contend, I am very glad to know it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have examined a good many railway schedules, and I have failed to find any two roads between two given points, one of them charging a low rate and the other a high one. The railway world would think that that would speedily operate to transfer the entire business to the road that was charging the low rate.

Therefore, I say, the Senator's suggestion is not a practical one. But if a railroad between New York and St. Louis is charging a rate to an intermediate point unreasonably high, which amounts, of course, to a discrimination to those points on the road that are entitled to as low or a lower rate, an absolute command over that discrimination is given to the Commission by this bill, and it is given all authority to reduce that rate, not because it is too high, but because it works an unjust discrimination against some other point on the line.

Mr. FORAKER. I knew the Senator would answer in that way. He could not answer in any other.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Allow me to pursue that subject one further step. Suppose instead of the rates being from New York to St. Louis, in one case it is a rate from Boston to St. Louis, the distance being greater than from New York to St. Louis, and the rate from Boston to St. Louis is much less than the rate from New York to St. Louis. In considering what should be a reasonable rate from New York to St. Louis, would not the unjust discrimination be taken into consideration?

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it was the same line——

Mr. ALDRICH. No; not the same line at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then this bill gives the law no application to a differential arising between points on separate lines of road.

Mr. ALDRICH. But that is not in the bill. That is only the Senator's contention as to something which is outside of the bill, an understanding of his about it. There is nothing of the kind in the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am not undertaking to discuss anything that is outside of the bill. I have undertaken to interpret the bill, and I think I have interpreted it correctly, if I can get anybody to read it. I seem to be at a disadvantage in that respect.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is nothing certainly in the bill, and I have read it with more or less care several times, which says that this unjust discrimination must be along the same line.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But the bill says that the complaint must be against a carrier or a line of carriers. The complaint is thoroughly described, and the Commission entertains no complaint except one made under section 13 of the present law.

Mr. ALDRICH. The complaint is that the rate is unreasonable, and the complainant cites instances where there is a rate between two points at a greater distance that is lower, and, therefore, that the rate on that account is not only unreasonable, but unjustly discriminatory.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That would be a question of evidence. If the Senator would examine carefully section 13 of the existing law he would see exactly the character of the complainant and exactly the character of the complaint. Those are the only complainants and the only complaints that could be entertained by the Commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the character of evidence the Commission would be obliged to take into consideration in determining a reasonable rate?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would not undertake to go into that.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Iowa has contended all the while that only one rate or the rates on one line of road could be challenged and dealt with at a time. I do not think many Senators agree with him as to that. I think when a rate is challenged they can take into consideration other rates between the same points and for such use as may be legitimate and proper in determining whether or not the rate charged is an excessive rate.

Now, in the case put by the Senator, when he comes to illustrate what is meant by discriminatory, he comes to an absolute agreement with me as to what this bill means. We all know that the rate from New York to San Francisco is a very low rate. I do not know exactly what it is, but we will say it is a dollar from New York to San Francisco on first-class goods. I do not know exactly what the rate from New York to Denver is, but we will say it is two dollars and a half, for the sake of illustration, on first-class goods.

Now, what will be the complaint before the Commission if this bill becomes a law? The complaint will be that the rate from New York to Denver, as compared with the rate from New York to San Francisco, is excessive, that it is too high, and in that way it is unjustly discriminatory. In no other sense can the question of discrimination be raised under this proposed statute. In no other sense could they undertake to deal with the subject.

It will not be claimed that under this law the citizens of Cincinnati, for instance, could go before the Commission and say "the rate from Cincinnati to Atlanta is $1," or whatever it may be, "and the rate from New York, twice the distance, is only the same, and therefore we are discriminated against." The Commission could not entertain any such complaint. That is the character of discriminations we have heretofore dealt with.

The other idea that the bill undertakes to deal with is not at all enlarged by the use of the words "unjustly discriminatory," the operation of the bill being confined to a single line, as the Senator from Iowa contends, because it is a question whether under all the circumstances the rate from New York to Denver in the case I put is too high.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, unless it can be shown in such a case that the rate from New York to Denver is too high, the evidence is then conclusive that the discrimination, whatever it is, is neither unjust nor unreasonable.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; and now the Senator answers himself. In answering whether or not the rate is too high he answers whether or not there is discrimination. If the rate be not too high there is no discrimination. That is just what I was contending for.

But now I want to get back to where I was. I was pointing out that in the House the framers of this bill, by the report, as they have informed us, have shown that they did not undertake to deal with any of these questions, except only whether or not rates were too high. They ignored everything else, and why did they ignore it? They ignored it because they found out that it would be impossible, in the first place, in my judgment, to deal satisfactorily in a measure of this kind with these other difficulties, and because, in the second place, they, too, by their proposition to enact this law without any reference to these other complaints paid tribute to the existing statutes.

They knew, just as we know now, that under the Elkins law, if the Department of Justice will only put it into operation, they can find a remedy for every complaint, and a better remedy than could be provided by such a bill as this, by simply a proceeding in court. That being the kind of law that we have, I have supposed all the while that we could best legislate to provide efficient remedies by strengthening and broadening it and by making the proceeding under that law without expense to the shipper. I set about doing that. It never occurred to me that anybody would become more intent on passing this particular kind of government rate-making legislation than they would be on remedying the evils it is claimed that this legislation is intended to remedy, but in that I seem to have been mistaken.

That law, as I say, provided that when a complaint was made before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission was of the opinion that there was a reasonable ground for the complaint, it might bring suit on behalf of the shipper to enjoin the rebate or to enjoin the discrimination. It said nothing at all about excessive rates. It did not even mention them. Nobody asked for any legislation on that account. Now, however, that excessive rates are being talked so much about, I think we should provide for them; and so, in proposing to amend that third section of the Elkins law, I have provided that, on complaint of the shipper that he is being charged an excessive rate, the Commission shall so far investigate that complaint as to determine whether or not there be reasonable ground to believe that the complaint is well made, and if so, the Commission shall, if the shipper so request, stop its hearing there, if the case is to be proceeded with, and shall at once send it to the Department of Justice, with a statement of the complaint and a brief statement of the facts relied upon to sustain it. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to send it to the proper district attorney, who shall immediately, without any delay whatever, without any option to him, bring a bill in the circuit court; and it shall be the duty of the court immediately to postpone all other business and proceed summarily to hear that complaint and to pass final judgment upon it. The bill will provide, as I propose to amend it, that this proceeding shall be in the name of the Government, at the expense of the Government, and without any expense whatever to the shipper.

Mr. President, it seems to me, in view of our experience with this statute, that with these amendments it will give a more certain, a more speedy, a less expensive, and more efficient remedy than anything that has been suggested.

Why should this be at the expense of the Government, instead of at the expense of the shipper? For this reason: No shipper who is subjected to an unjust rate suffers alone; he is only one of a class. There may be hundreds, there may be thousands, of shippers who are prejudicially affected by that rate just as the complaining shipper is. The proceeding, therefore, should be in its nature a quasi public proceeding on behalf of all who are interested. That kind of proceeding can not be entertained by the courts, unless we by statute so enact.

Therefore I undertake to confer the power upon the court in such a case as that to entertain a bill setting forth that complaint and asking for relief against it. I have provided that that proceeding shall be not only in the name of the Government, but at the expense of the Government, and without any expense whatever to the shipper. The reason shippers have not had the relief which they should have had is largely due to the fact, Mr. President, that no shipper feels like going to law with a railroad for his antagonist, and he will not do so unless he have a grievous case that he can not well longer endure; but if you make his remedy easy, if you make it without expense to him, if you make it in the name of the Government, the very minute he makes a complaint and the Interstate Commerce Commission investigates that complaint and comes to the conclusion that there is probable ground for it, and then notifies the railroad company, the railroad company, knowing that it is to be sued, not by a shipper but by the Government, without expense to the shipper and at the expense of the Government, will in every case, I think we may safely say, quickly adjust that difference with the shipper if it can possibly do so. No railroad would care to be prosecuted in that way if the complaint were a just one; they would resist only unjust complaints; and in that way we would get rid of much of the litigation that is talked about.

Now, according to the way I have proposed to amend this section, the Interstate Commerce Commission would entertain this complaint, and the shipper, when he files his complaint, will be given an option to say to the Interstate Commerce Commission, instead of proceeding under the Hepburn bill—I will call it that for the sake of intelligently referring to it—and having a full hearing before the Commission and then going into the court under this broad review amendment, which it is insisted shall be put upon this bill, and which I think the probabilities are will be put upon it—the shipper will say: "Instead of proceeding before the Commission, and then proceeding again and doing it all over again in the court, I would rather have the Government take up my battle and fight it for me in the court in the first instance. I ask you, therefore, to send this to the Department of Justice, and have the proper district attorney bring the suit, and I will look on and make suggestions while the fight proceeds and the Government pays the bill."

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what he means when he designates definitely by the word "this"—"this broad review?" What broad review does the Senator refer to.

Mr. FORAKER. I said "this broad review" that has been so much discussed here in this Chamber.

Mr. BACON. We have heard quite a number of suggestions as to review and the breadth that it should have. The Senator, being very active and well informed in the matter, and doubtless having information upon which he predicated that expression, I wish—not for argument, but for information—to ask——

Mr. FORAKER. I will give the Senator the information if I can——

Mr. BACON. What is the view of the Senator as to the breadth of the review that is contemplated and which he says he thinks will be incorporated as a feature of the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, in the remarks I made here on the 28th of February, I dealt with that subject and expressed myself fully in regard to it; but I have no objection to briefly restating it. I said in those remarks that we were proposing by this bill to command the Interstate Commerce Commission, when a rate was challenged and found to be unreasonable and unjust, to set it aside and substitute in place of it a rate that would be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. That did not mean a confiscatory rate nor an extortionate rate.

I said in that connection that as to a confiscatory rate on the one hand or an extortionate rate on the other hand, it was my opinion that the court was open to the carrier whose property was about to be confiscated or to the shipper who was being subjected to an extortionate rate to apply for a remedy, without anything being put in this statute on the subject; but I said, as between the extortionate rate on the one hand and the confiscatory rate on the other, there was a wide latitude. Anywhere between the two extremes the Commission might fix a rate, as to which it might be contended that it was just and reasonable and fairly remunerative, and being a legislative act, it would not be subject to review by the courts unless we should so say. But I said, having commanded them to make a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, we ought to lodge authority somewhere to revise their work, and say whether or not they had complied with the command of Congress—not that the court should make the rate, but merely ascertain whether the Commission had made a just and reasonable rate. I illustrated that in this way: I said the Commission might make a rate which would yield a return of 6 per cent on the property employed in the transportation; that I did not doubt any court would hold was a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate. They might put it so low as to yield only 4 per cent. About that the courts might differ. It might be so low, again, as to yield only 2 per cent.

I said I thought the court would hold in that case that the Commission had failed to comply with the command of Congress, or had failed to fix a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, and that the court would say so if we gave it the authority. That is the kind of broad review I have been talking about. I have explained it just as I did when I first spoke, but more briefly, because I do not want to go into it in the extended way in which I then did.

Mr. BACON. What I desired to ask the Senator was whether he meant by that expression a review that would put it into the power of the reviewing court to review the entire action of the Commission?

Mr. FORAKER. I think so.

Mr. BACON. Review it de novo?

Mr. FORAKER. When the Senator says "the entire action of the Commission," I presume it would be necessary to go over the entire action; the bill as it now is, when this question does get before the court, requires the court to go over the entire proceeding, for the bill as it now is——

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not take my inquiry.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will wait just a moment, I think he will see that I do; but I will suffer another interruption, and be glad to be interrupted again. If the Senator so desires, I will hear the Senator now.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, thanking the Senator for his courtesy, I will say that I was more desirous to get from the Senator what he intended to be understood as meaning by the expression "this broad review." If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I wish to know whether the Senator had in mind a review which would simply cover the law questions in the case—not only the constitutional, but other law questions—or whether he meant a review of the entire action of the Commission, involving not only legal questions, but all questions that might grow out of the exercise of discretion?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly, Mr. President; all questions—the evidence, all the circumstances, and everything else. I do not think a court could intelligently determine whether or not a commission, in fixing a particular rate as just and reasonable and fairly remunerative, had acted in compliance with the command of the statute unless the court was possessed of all the facts that operated on the mind of the Commission.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator by that means to accomplish that which he has suggested on some previous occasion—that this really ought to be with the court, if it is to be exercised, and not with the Commission; that the Commission really would, under the view of the Senator, be very little more than those who would suggest, and that the court at last would be the tribunal which would determine and fix the rates. Is that the view of the Senator?

Mr. FORAKER. That is the view, though I might state it somewhat differently from what the Senator has stated it.

Mr. BACON. I am asking that for the purpose of asking the Senator a succeeding question when I fully understand what his proposition is.

Mr. ALDRICH. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], I will suggest to him that the proposition of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is a very broad one—that the court shall fix the rate.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I did not observe that the Senator from Georgia said that. Did the Senator ask me whether or not I advocated the fixing of rates by the court?

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], I think, does not exactly state what I said; and, with the permission of the Senator, I will endeavor to again state it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am going to speak presently as to what the power of the court is in respect to fixing rates——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. And if the Senator will only yield to me until then, I think I will answer what is in his mind.

Mr. BACON. I want to correct what the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] suggested as to what I had said. I did not intend at least—and I do not think that the RECORD will bear out the statement—to say that the purpose was to have the court fix the rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator used that language.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. Let me make my statement. What I think I substantially said was, that would be the effect of it; not that de novo the court should fix the rate, but that if the Supreme Court, the court of final resort, had the review of all the features of the action of the Commission, not only including law questions but including everything which would arise out of the exercise of discretion—if they had the whole subject-matter thus brought before them for determination, the effect would be the same as if they fixed the rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me answer that question, as the Senator has now modified it; and I hope the Senator will let me proceed.

There is nothing whatever in anything I said, and I did not imagine there was anything in what the Senator asked me, that indicated that I was contending that any court—the Supreme Court or the circuit court—should fix the rate. In the case put by the Senator, if the Commission had fixed a rate which became the subject of judicial review, the only question would be whether or not that particular rate was a just and reasonable rate, and that is simply and purely a judicial question. The court would not substitute another rate in place of that rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask a very brief question of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; very well.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Georgia think that a court can ascertain whether the constitutional rights of a party have been invaded by an order without an inquiry into the facts as well as the law?

Mr. BACON. That is a pretty broad question. It is an abstract one. In a concrete case the question could be very much more easily answered. Of course there is no case that does not have facts connected with it, and out of the facts arises the law.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator was inveighing, as I understood him, against a proposition to allow the courts to investigate the facts, and I could not see any other process by which they could ascertain them.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say I was not inveighing against anything. I was trying to get a statement from the Senator from Ohio as to exactly what he meant by the expression "this broad review." As I have suggested, the purpose of my inquiry was to ask him another question predicated upon a reply to that. That was the purpose I had, but as the Senator from Ohio said he preferred to go on, I refrained from asking the other question.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish, of course, to be discourteous to the Senator or to cut him off.

Mr. BACON. I do not so consider it at all. I do not understand the Senator to be in any manner discourteous.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection at all to yielding at any time to a question. But if the Senator will read the remarks I made on February 28 he will find that I dealt at some length with this subject. I have undertaken to state exactly what was the effect of that which I then said. As the Senator from Rhode Island has so pertinently suggested, no court of review could determine whether or not a given rate was confiscatory in one case or extortionate in another without not only looking through the proceedings of the Commission, but also looking at all the facts and hearing all the testimony that might properly be offered. That would apply, therefore, to a constitutional or restricted review, as it has been called, just as much as it would to the broad review about which I have been commenting.

I was about to say, when the Senator interrupted me, that one criticism that I think we have a just right to insist upon as to this bill is that in the proceeding that it does provide for, where the court reviews any action brought by the Commission to enforce its order, the language of the statute is that the court shall review with a view to determining whether or not the order was regularly made; that is all; not whether it was a lawful order, not whether it was in compliance with the command of the statute, but whether or not the proceeding had been regularly instituted and proceeded with.

How absolutely without value that is as a remedy, Senators will realize when their attention is called to the fact that this proceeding which the courts are to determine the regularity of is by the statute made an irregular proceeding. There are no pleadings to be filed; there is no bill, no answer, no demurrer, no motion, no anything. A shipper may write a letter and make a complaint, and immediately the machinery provided by this bill and the existing law is set into operation. Nobody comes and makes formal answer. They come and answer each according to whatever the suggestion may be that is in his mind that he desires to make. Testimony is taken; and not only is it the duty and practice of the Commission to hear all that may be brought by the parties, but the language of the statute is that the Commission shall proceed in its own way, on its own motion, without a suggestion from anybody, to get any kind of evidence on which it may see fit to predicate an order. A greater cheat and fraud and humbug could not be suggested—I do not want to use offensive language, but I want to use expressive language—than is employed in the review provided for in this bill; in suits to enforce the orders of the Commission the court shall look at nothing except only to see whether or not the order was regularly made, whether an irregular proceeding, commanded by the statute to be such, is a regular proceeding. There is no ground of defense whatever in such a provision.

It is to avoid all such troubles as that that I want the amendment for which I am speaking to be added to this bill. It is not in conflict with any provision of this bill, but it is a remedy in and of itself which the shipper shall have a right to resort to as an alternative remedy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not possible or probable that the men who drew this bill, in using the words "regularly made," did not have in mind to limit the courts to the question whether or not the Commission, acting as the instrument of Congress, had obeyed the law of Congress in its proceedings, and that there was no purpose to have the court try the case itself and determine whether or not the rate was other than lawful—in other words, whether it had been made according to law?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, the Commission——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am merely asking for the Senator's view on that supposition.

Mr. FORAKER. I take pleasure in giving the Senator the benefit of my view. When I recall that the existing law provides that the court, when called upon to enforce an order of the Commission, is authorized to hear fully and determine whether or not the order was lawfully made; when I recall that the bill framed and sent to the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate by the Interstate Commerce Commission provided carefully that the review of the court should be to determine whether the orders of the Commission called in question had been lawfully made; when I remember that this law has been in force all these years, and was the first proposition that was brought before our committee, and that not until the Hepburn bill and the other bills introduced about the same time were brought forth, did anybody hear of such a thing as confining the court to the question whether or not the order had been regularly made—when I recall all that, I think it is very clear what was intended, and that is that the Commission should hear a complaint and, in the irregular way in which the Commission proceeds, should make an order. If the railroad refused to carry it out, then the Commission should bring a suit in the court to enforce its order, and in that proceeding the court could determine not whether the order had been lawfully made—which would be to determine whether or not it had been made in accordance with the command of Congress—but whether or not it had been regularly made—that is to say, whether or not notice had been given to the other party in time, whether or not anybody had been allowed to come before the Commission, whether or not testimony had been heard, whether or not the requirements of the statute in such an irregular proceeding had been complied with. There is not anything about whether it had been made in accordance with the statute under which the Commission was acting.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to this fact: Whatever may be the strength of the legal position of the framers of this bill, the suit to which the Senator from Ohio calls attention has nothing whatever to do with the suit which the carrier institutes to protect his rights under the order of the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota had listened more attentively he would not have interrupted me to say that, because that is exactly what I did say. The bill does not provide for a suit being brought by the carrier. I was speaking of that provision of the bill where the Commission is authorized to bring a suit to enforce its own order.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but the Senator was insisting that under the suit the only question that could be raised was the regularity of the order.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; and I do still.

Mr. CLAPP. The history of this thing is simply this——

Mr. FORAKER. Can not the Senator give that in his own time?

Mr. CLAPP. That is the trouble. Every time this bill is assailed, when we want a discussion of the bill we are asked to wait until its opponents get through.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator. I want the bill to have "a square deal" [laughter], and I want to do all I can to give it one.

Mr. CLAPP. Independent of "a square deal," this debate is doing no good unless it is based upon an analysis of this bill. It will not do simply to stand here and deliver addresses upon questions arising under the pending bill. I am not criticising the Senator from Ohio in saying that, but I am justifying my own course. I think we ought to debate this bill, and, as these questions arise, discuss them so as to see whether we are right or whether we are wrong. If we are wrong, we are as anxious as anybody else to be placed right.

Under the existing law, the order does not as a legal matter go into effect, and the Commission has to bring suit to enforce it. That involving the order itself, of course, under the present law, the carrier can raise these questions. The purpose of this bill is to change that rule and put the order into effect at a given time named in the proposed law or else set by the Commission in its order. This bill as it is now framed contemplates that, before the order goes into effect, the carrier may be heard; in other words, the order goes into effect unless suspended or vacated by a court.

The action provided for on page 16 of the bill, to which the Senator from Ohio calls attention, is a sort of supplementary proceeding, not involving the question of the constitutionality of the order; but after the carrier has had its opportunity to test that question, then the bill provides—

> If any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the Commission, other than for the payment of money, while the same is in effect, any party injured thereby, or the Commission in its own name, may apply to the circuit court in the district where such carrier has its principal operating office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order shall happen, for an enforcement of such order.

That is, after the carrier has had its opportunity to combat the order on the ground that it is an invasion of constitutional rights; and then, in the supplemental proceeding, the carrier has neglected or failed to interpose its objection, and the order has gone into effect; this proceeding is simply to enforce it. There is no occasion, it seems to me, that in that proceeding there should be any question except as to the regularity of the order.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the indignation of the Senator from Minnesota is rather surprising to me. If he had been in the Chamber during all the time I have been occupying the floor, he would have known that I have already commented on the fact that, in my opinion, the court, under this bill as it is framed, could hear a question where a constitutional right has been infringed, but that, without action on our part, it could not inquire as to the reasonableness of a rate.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, if that be true, why is the Senator attacking the provision on page 16?

Mr. FORAKER. Because it is a fraud, a cheat, and a humbug, and I intend to expose it as such. That is why; and I am not going to do it in essay form, either.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that under existing law, when a carrier refuses to obey an order of the Commission, the Commission has authority to go into court and sue the carrier to compel it to obey the order, and the court will determine whether the order was lawfully made.

The provision of existing law is that in such a proceeding as that the inquiry of the court shall be as to whether the order was lawfully made. That means not only a regular proceeding before the Commission, but it means also a rate, if that be the subject-matter of the order, that is in accordance with the command of Congress that it shall be a just and reasonable rate. And the court in such a proceeding will hear everything and determine whether the order was lawfully made.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it not a fact that under existing law that is the first suit? I do not want to be considered——

Mr. FORAKER. I have already commented on that. Under the existing law the Commission has no right to make a rate to be substituted——

Mr. CLAPP. No; but under existing law the suit brought by the Commission is the first suit brought, the first occasion for bringing any suit. Until that suit is brought there is no occasion for applying to a court.

Mr. FORAKER. Does not everybody know that without being told who knows that the law as it stands does not authorize the Commission to make a rate at all? It is only because we are now proposing to change the law and to authorize the Commission to make a rate and compel the carrier to put it into operation, unless he submits to a penalty of $5,000 a day for not doing it, that the other provision about applying for an injunction is incorporated in the bill. I have already commented on that. I do not want to go over it again.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not ask the Senator to go over it again. But I submit, while everybody ought to know that, if a man had listened to the Senator's argument, in which he seeks to draw a parallel between a suit under existing law and a suit provided for in section 16 of this proposed law, the supplemental law, he would draw the conclusion that there was some other provision in existing law.

Mr. FORAKER. I have already argued that all I care to; I think I have said all that I should be required to say on that subject.

There is no provision in this bill authorizing the hearing by the court of any complaint except only that the rate is extortionate on the one hand or confiscatory on the other. As to rates between those, there is no authority for a review by the court at all; and that is what I want to put into the bill, so that the court may make such a review.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Let me finish, and then I will yield. When the carrier refuses to obey an order that the Commission makes, under the law as it is to-day the inquiry is as to whether the order was lawful. Under the law as it will be if this bill is enacted into law the court will have jurisdiction in such suits to inquire not whether the rate is lawful, not whether the Commission has obeyed our instructions and given a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate if we adopt the bill in that form, but the inquiry will be whether or not the Commission has proceeded regularly. I do not need to call on anybody to tell me why that was put in. Everybody knows. It was put in there to restrict the power of the court, in so far as it is competent by statute to do it, to inquire as to an invasion of purely constitutional rights of property, and nothing else.

Now, in the bill framed and sent to us by the Interstate Commission they provided that upon this same inquiry the question to be determined by the court shall be not whether the order had been regularly made, but whether the order had been lawfully made. Never until the Hepburn bill and those that came in about the same time did anybody presume to ask the Congress of the United States to limit a court in reviewing the question whether a commission to which, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] well said this morning, we are proposing to give the most autocratic power had, in the exercise of those powers, obeyed our command or violated our command. They undertake to do it by inserting the word "regular." There is not any secret as to what was meant by it, but the character of such a proposed amendment of the law does not appear until it is remembered that this inquiry is to be, whether an order was regularly made in a proceeding which under this proposed statute is commanded to be irregular. It could not be anything but regular. You could not violate the statute by any kind of departure from ordinary judicial proceedings in which the Commission might see fit to indulge.

This much I started out to say, but I would like——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me just one question?

Mr. FORAKER. I will; but I should like then to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to ask the Senator how he construes the words "determine and prescribe what may in its judgment?" If those words remain in the bill, as between a confiscatory rate and an extortionate rate, is not the finding of the Commission final and can not be reviewed?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes. The insertion in this bill of the words "in its opinion"——

Mr. ELKINS. "In its judgment."

Mr. FORAKER. "In its judgment;" that is to say, they shall ascertain in the first place whether or not, in their opinion, a rate that is challenged is unjust and unreasonable; and if so, they shall set it aside and state what in the judgment of the Commission is a just and reasonable rate.

If you get into the court to review this question of regularity, the question will be whether an irregular proceeding has been regular, and whether the opinion in the one case as to the rate set aside and the judgment of the Commission as to the rate substituted are, in fact, the opinion and judgment of the Commission. In other words, there is no review possible, for who can say the rate was not what the opinion of the Commission was it should be? It is a craftily drawn statute, or bill—

I hope it will never be a statute in this form—intended deliberately by lawyers who knew what they were doing to take away from the court all power of review with a view of determining whether a rate in a given case is just and reasonable.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I make it for the purpose of getting the Senator's interpretation of certain sections to which I desire to call his attention. On page 11 of the bill there is evidently a contemplation of a resort to the courts on the part of the carrier in case it deems the rate to be confiscatory or otherwise unlawful. That is true, is it not?

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I have already commented on.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The Senator will pardon me a moment. This is only suggestive. The question I wished to ask the Senator is this: The language he complains of on page 16 relates to the case of a carrier who fails to obey the order of the Commission.

Now does not that relate to a case exclusively where the carrier has failed to avail himself of the opportunity to go into court and where he simply stands defiant of the Commission; and is it not the case in which the law seeks to provide that not having challenged the lawfulness, if you please, of the order of the Commission, not having sought by resort to the courts to set aside the order of the Commission, thereby recognizing the finality of the order, the carrier is in disobedience of it? If that be the case, is it not proper that the inquiry should be limited to the question whether the order was regularly made and the carrier duly served?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has, I think, failed to perceive the character of the argument I have been making. I have been contending that under the provision to which the Senator calls my attention, where the carrier may apply to the court, it has no authority, because the statute does not give it any, to apply except only where the rate is confiscatory, or, in the case of the shipper, where the rate is extortionate. Now, I am talking about the rates that are intermediate between the two extremes, those that, according to the proposed statute, are to be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. But we are bound to assume that most of the rates would fall within the latter class. I say the proposed statute gives no opportunity whatever for a review in court of the question of reasonableness. It gives no opportunity to the court to review or to the carrier or the shipper to apply to the court upon that question——

I want the attention of the Senator from Georgia, if the Senator from Kansas will let me have it, for the Senator from Georgia interrupted me, and I am anxious to hurry along without being further interrupted if possible. Therefore, except only as to the invasion of constitutional rights this bill gives no remedy at all. They are the only ones that can be contemplated by the provision to which the Senator has called my attention.

When it comes to the question whether a rate is reasonable in such a case as the other provision relates to, where the carrier has refused to obey and the Commission has brought suit, why should not the court be allowed to examine that question, and see whether the rate prescribed is just and reasonable and fairly remunerative? Does not Congress want the Commission to make just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rates? Could not the court be allowed, if it is going to review it at all, to review that particular question?

But now, Mr. President, that brings me to another phase of this bill that I want to speak about. I did not have it in mind to speak about it in this connection, but I will. What is it that this bill provides? That the Commission shall fix a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate.

When I spoke here as long ago as last December I pointed out that that was such an indefinite standard that it was not any standard at all. All that Congress can do, if it has power to make rates at all, is to fix just and reasonable rates. If we confer that power on the Commission, we have divested ourselves of every particle of the rate-making power we have and given it all to the Commission. And yet Senators tell me there is no delegation by this provision of legislative power.

Are these words sufficient to create a standard? I contended that they were not as long ago as the time I have mentioned. I contended that they were not, at considerable length, when I spoke here on February 28. I want to renew that contention—not to argue it over again, but to call attention to a decision rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States since those arguments were made. I refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Michigan Tax cases, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer. I have it before me. When I spoke here in December I took the position that if we proposed to authorize the Commission to make rates we had power to do it, if we have power to make rates at all. But I said in doing so we must be careful so to confer the power as to make their duty with respect to rate making purely administrative. In that behalf we must be careful not to confer upon the Commission any exercise of judgment or discretion. If we did, it would be fatal, because if the Congress have power to make just and reasonable rates, it is the judgment of Congress that the people are entitled to and not the judgment of some commission.

Now, I gave some illustrations of what I meant by that. I called attention in that connection to the fact that in Iowa as long ago as when the first "granger law," as it was called, was enacted, back, I think, in 1873 or 1874, this question arose and they met it. They met it in one of the ways in which it must be met, and one of the few ways in which it is possible to meet it. They divided the railroads into classes—Class A, Class B, Class C, Class D—and then they provided that the rates on everything they could think of to alphabetically enumerate, from apples down to watermelons, should be fixed according to a table which they set out in their statute; on freight of a certain kind, which they named, over a road falling within Class A, so much per mile; so much per mile on a certain commodity over a railroad that fell in Class B, Class C, Class D, and so on, respectively. But what was the result, and why did they do that? Why did they go to the trouble to classify roads and to fix the rates with that care? Because they recognized that they could not intrust legislative discretion or judgment to a commission or to any official of the law. They recognized that they must establish a standard to which the commissioner could conform by simply making a mathematical calculation. He could inquire what class the road belonged to, what the particular freight was, how many miles it was to be shipped, and then taking the table he could figure up what the rate was.

They did the same thing, only not so elaborately, in Wisconsin. They classified the roads and fixed the rates, in principle, according to the Iowa statute. They did the same thing, in effect, in Minnesota, but instead of authorizing the commission to make rates they authorized the commission there to make a recommendation as to what the rate ought to be, and if the road did not see fit to adopt the recommendation, which the commission had a right to make, it was the duty of the commission to go into court and get an injunction enjoining the railroad from charging any other rate, or a mandamus compelling it to charge only the rate fixed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Georgia will bear with me for just a moment, another way to confer this power and make it administrative in character would be for Congress to say the Commission shall fix rates at so much per ton per mile. In other words, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] the other day said he was coming more and more to believe ought to be the rule, to fix rates on a flat mileage basis. That, I believe, is almost his exact langauge. The Senator from South Carolina nods his assent, and thus we have that established.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Ohio does not assent to that.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not assent to that. If I were to assent to that and that were to become the law, I do not know what the growers of strawberries in South Carolina would do, or what the peach growers of northern Georgia, who are so ably represented by the Senator from Georgia, would do. They are making a great clamor to me for fear there will be legislation enacted here that will put them at a disadvantage in getting into the market at New York as compared with the peach growers of Delaware.

Only a few days ago—I have already referred to it in the Senate, but I will do it again, as perhaps I have the attention now of some Senators who did not hear me then—I received two letters by the same mail—one from the citrus-fruit growers of southern California, complaining of the Supreme Court because of a decision it recently announced, and claiming that they were subjected to unjust rates, unjust conditions, and the other from a place in Delaware—Medford, I believe it was, or some such name as that; Milford, possibly—complaining that the people in southern California had practically the same rate from California into New York that they have from Milford, Del. A flat mileage basis would make impossible that kind of rate making.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator says he is opposed to the idea of a flat mileage basis.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not that in accordance with the Declaration of Independence?

Mr. FORAKER. That is going back a long way to fix rates.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the foundation of this fight, if we are ever going to settle it right, because if the people of Delaware are discriminated against by the local roads and are compelled to pay an equal amount on their peaches to get them to New York that the people of South Carolina are paying—and we do not pay any more than they do, though we are 800 miles away—it is wrong. Now, I say that, and I will stick by it, although I am a peach grower myself in South Carolina.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the peaches will be pretty hard and sour by the time the Senator gets home if we are to make that kind of a law. The greatest achievement of the railway system of this country has been the inauguration of a system of rate making and charging for the transportation of freight that has made every section of this country accessible to every other section.

Mr. GALLINGER. On a commercial basis.

Mr. FORAKER. It is done upon a commercial basis.

The making of rates is very much misunderstood by some people, perhaps possibly by myself, but as I understand it, there is really no such thing as individuals making rates. The laws of trade and commerce make them. The railroads which haul peaches out of South Carolina do not want to charge so little for taking them to New York as will be equal only to a like service rendered for the transportation of peaches from near-by Delaware, but they do it. Why? In order that the people of South Carolina may grow peaches, and that they may have a market for their peaches.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will bear with me for a moment. The question all the while is not whether they are charging too little from South Carolina to New York, but whether they are charging too much from Delaware to New York. And if they are not charging too much from Delaware to New York, who is harmed? Not the people in South Carolina, because they have a market that they could not get into except for the low rate; not the people of Delaware, if they are charged only a just and reasonable rate, because the people of South Carolina are permitted to come into that market in competition with them on no better rate than they have, and surely not the consumers in New York who are thus given two sources of supply and the benefit of competition.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. In a minute. I want to make plain that no one can complain. Not the people of South Carolina; not the people of Delaware; not the people in New York, for they have two sources from which to draw their supplies instead of only one. If the people of New York had to rely upon the peach orchards of Delaware alone for their supply, peaches would be worth a good deal more than they are now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say to the Senator that if he knew a little more about peaches and their growing he would not be arguing like he does for this simple reason: The peach crop in South Carolina begins to move to market the last of June, and it is done and gone, eaten up, before the Delaware peaches are ripe.

I want to say while I am on my feet that the complaint of the citrus-fruit growers of California was against the decision of the Supreme Court, which did not permit the shipper to route his fruit, thereby prolonging the time it is in transit and causing the fruit to rot by four or five days' delay, caused by sending it some roundabout way to suit the railroad which has a monopoly of the business.

Mr. FORAKER. If that be true as to peaches, let the Senator take something else for illustration. I suppose the peaches in South Carolina and the peaches in northern Georgia ripen about the same time.

Mr. TILLMAN. About the same time.

Mr. FORAKER. They go into market in competition with each other, and as they are not equally distant from New York if the peach growers of northern Georgia had to compete on the mileage basis with the peach growers of South Carolina they would be at a disadvantage in the market in New York.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are speaking relatively of conditions as between the peach growers of Georgia and South Carolina and the peach growers of Delaware?

Mr. FORAKER. I was.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am contending that it is unjust and wrong in principle and practice for the railroad to charge the peach growers within 40 or 50 miles of New York as much as they charge us in South Carolina, 900 miles off. I will stand and die by that proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. It is all wrong when it applies to South Carolina and Delaware, but it is all right when it applies to South Carolina and Georgia.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are relatively as far from New York one as the other. There may be 75 miles difference.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; or 150 or 200 miles, I should think.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not care; say 200 miles.

Mr. FORAKER. I will assume that; but it does not make any difference whether it is 75 miles or 150 miles or 200 miles. It is a great principle I am talking about.

Mr. TILLMAN. I stand by the Declaration of Independence side of it, and you have a new idea of it.

Mr. FORAKER. I have not any new idea. It is new only to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I heard——

Mr. FORAKER. Let me put another question to the Senator, which is suggested to me by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. But I want to answer first about the citrus-fruit growers of California. [To Mr. ELKINS.] Remind me of the cotton later.

The citrus-fruit growers of California brought suit, in which they asserted that they ought to be given the right to route their own fruit; that they ought to have the right to determine over what roads, shipping from California to New York, their fruit should go. The railroads contended that they ought to be allowed to control the routing. The Supreme Court decided upon the facts as well as the law of the case that the roads had that right and should have that right; but what were the facts? Why is it the fruit growers of California are making complaint? In that case it was established without any contradiction, beyond any question whatever, by testimony that was agreed to be correct, that the shippers wanted to control the routing so that they might divert their freight, first to one road and then to another, that they might demand a rebate from them. And one fruit company had exacted in two or three years' time prior to the bringing of that suit a hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of rebates—the very thing we are trying to break up. If it had not been for the court intervening to set aside the order of the Commission and prohibiting and breaking up that kind of bad practice, it would still be going on.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator's principle is erroneous and wrong again. If the Senator himself were going from here to California, and some ticket agent said, "I am going to ship you via Cincinnati and St. Louis and Denver, and you shall not go any other way," the Senator from Ohio would kick, and kick very hard. He would not be bulldozed in any such manner. The man who has something to ship, and knows that he can get it to market quicker and to his advantage by one road, has a right to ship it over that road.

Mr. FORAKER. The record shows it got to market quicker when the railroad routed it and when no rebate was at stake than when the shipper routed it.

Let us think for a moment about this mileage basis. I am standing here by the side of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. He represents an agricultural State. They send great quantities of grain of every kind to the seaboard cities; some for consumption there, most of it for export, perhaps.

Now, if they were to be charged according to the mileage basis, what would be the effect upon them? You can better imagine it than describe it. The farmers of Iowa compete in the markets of New York and Boston with the farmers of Vermont and New Hampshire and New York on butter and eggs and cheese and all kinds of dairy products, and they compete because they are able to get practically the same rate. If the farmers of New York and Vermont and New Hampshire are charged too high rates, they have a right to complain. But if their rates are reasonable, and the roads reduce rates to a low standard to enable people who have butter and eggs and milk in Iowa to send their products to the eastern markets and sell them there, it is a great blessing to the whole country. It is a good thing for Iowa. The mileage basis would take away from Iowa all possibility of competing in New York with New Hampshire and Vermont, and lose to that people that market.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it must be a good thing for the consumer.

Mr. FORAKER. Just as I was going to say, as the Senator from New Hampshire has well suggested, it is a good thing for the people of Iowa, and a better thing still for the people of New York and Boston. Those great cities could not draw from near by a sufficient supply to enable them to have butter and eggs and milk and all these products which are brought these long distances under the present system. They could not have them at reasonable prices, except only under the system we have. They could not have them under the mileage system.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina about the cotton mills.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will meet the Senator on the cotton-mill basis or any other basis, but I want to ask, Does he imagine that any milk was ever shipped into New York City from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. I am told it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is condensed milk, then.

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. That would go——

Mr. FORAKER. Governor Cummins testified before our committee, as I remember it now, to the fact that butter and eggs——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh!

Mr. FORAKER. And dairy products——

Mr. TILLMAN. Butter and eggs possibly.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, it is possible no milk is shipped that long distance——

Mr. TILLMAN. No milk, Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Take out the milk, then. I am not trying to establish any one fact, but a great principle.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want the Senator just to look at this aspect of it. The farmer in Vermont, New York, and Connecticut is competing with the farmer in Iowa.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly he is.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the manufacturer in New York, Connecticut, and Vermont, who has his goods protected by the tariff and then is allowed to buy in the American market? This is a new idea. It is another protective tariff against the farmer in the near-by States in favor of the farmer in Iowa, is it not?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] was calling my attention just then, and the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from West Virginia will have enough to do to bother me on his own hook without trying to whisper into the ear of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. He was not addressing himself to what the Senator is just now talking about, and——

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just trying to get the Senator's view.

Mr. FORAKER. Between both I did not hear either.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want the Senator's view on the relative justice of the idea that the farmer in these near-by States around New York City and Boston has to compete with the far-away farmer in Iowa. The railroads give the farmer in Iowa the advantage of low rates relatively as compared with the near-by farmer, while your New York and Massachusetts manufacturer is protected by the tariff against competition from anybody who might come into the field against him.

Mr. FORAKER. No American manufacturer is thus protected against other American manufacturers. All American manufacturers are put on an equality under the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course; and I want the farmers to be on an equality under the law.

Mr. FORAKER. And, Mr. President, no class of people have a higher protective tariff levied on the importation into this country of the products they bring forth than the farmer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yet the Senator is right here arguing for the protection of the Iowa farmer against the New York farmer——

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. By a railroad rate discrimination in his favor.

Mr. FORAKER. That is simply one of the mysteries of the tariff the Senator has not yet fully sounded the depths of. The Iowa farmer wants not only to produce butter and eggs, but he wants some place to sell his butter and eggs; and if there was a manufactory flourishing about him, he would have a home market there; and if they do not take all he has to sell, he can ship it off to New York, if he can find some railroad that will carry it at a rate cheap enough to enable him to sell it when he gets there in competition with the same products from near-by points.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. If it be true that the distance is so great that on a mileage basis the people of New York could not be provided with the chickens and eggs from Iowa, to which the Senator refers, would not the necessary result of that be that many of the industries which are now concentrated in New York would be compelled to go nearer to the chickens and eggs in Iowa in order to give their operatives cheaper supplies? And the effect of that would be a wider and a juster distribution of the population and wealth in this country.

Mr. FORAKER. That is a very interesting question, and we will take it up and discuss it when we come to take up the revision of the tariff.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is the tariff.

Mr. FORAKER. It is too broad a subject for me to undertake to deal with in the midst of a speech that is devoted to rate making.

Mr. TILLMAN. But this rate making is in a sense a protective tariff. The Senator has been contending for a protective tariff by the railroads in behalf of the western farmer and against the farmers of New England and New York.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to use the word politely, I will not allow him to becloud the issue. We are talking about rate making and I have said all the while, in the cases I have been putting for illustration, that the question is, whether the near-by rate was an unjustly high rate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will simply remind the Senator from Ohio that the suggestion I made was directly in reply to the argument that we had to give these cheap rates in order to get commodities to the centers of population. I myself would like to take the centers of population a little closer to the cheaper commodities.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will journey across the West he will find that the manufacturing industries there are flourishing. He will find that they are springing up in every direction. He will find that they do not follow chickens and eggs and ducks, but they grow up in every community, and wherever they do they constitute a home market where the farmers near by can find a place to sell their products.

Mr. ALDRICH. And they are not going up any more rapidly in any part of the United States than in the States of the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. FORAKER. Everywhere. That reminds me that I wanted to ask a question about cotton.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it, notwithstanding, the fact that most of our goods are shipped to China in competition with Germany and England and have not a dollar of protective tariff on them, but in the open field, with no favors to anyone?

Mr. FORAKER. Can any man inform me where they have a higher tariff than Germany has?

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean exports. We go to China to sell cloth in competition with Germany and England, and we do not get the benefit of any protective tariff. Therefore we do not get a square deal when our railroad rates are all in the interest of New York, and we can not get any fair play in the fixing of rates.

Mr. FORAKER. No other country gets any such benefit as that to which the Senator refers. But let me tell the Senator what his State is getting great benefit from, and that is from the system of rate making that is now employed. That has been the case especially during the last ten or fifteen or twenty years. Perhaps as recently as twenty years ago the first cotton mills were started in South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia, in competition with the cotton mills of New England, and now already those cotton mills have increased in number and in capacity until they are practically equal in number and capacity to the cotton mills of New England. And they have a great advantage over the cotton mills of New England—they are near by where the cotton is grown.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are no manufacturers in the United States who get more material benefit from the protective tariff than the cotton manufacturers of South Carolina. They understand it, too. The Senator from South Carolina may not, but the manufacturers do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly they do, and possibly the Senator from Rhode Island could explain how and why this is true.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not want to interrupt the speech of the Senator from Ohio by an explanation now.

Mr. TILLMAN. For my part I simply gave this illustration of the condition—that the cotton manufacturers of my State, so far from getting any benefit from the protective tariff at home, have to ship their cotton to China to get a market.

Mr. FORAKER. A great many other people have to ship to China to get a market. In our country here at home we consume all our necessities call for—all the cotton from the South as well as every other product that is brought forth in this country, whether in the South or in the North; and for the surplus which we have we must find markets abroad. They send from South Carolina to China only the surplus. If they can sell their cotton here at home they sell it here at home, in New York, for instance, and other near-by markets. They sell only the surplus abroad. We send only our surplus wheat and corn and other farm products abroad. We consume everything in this land that we can, and we consume almost an incomprehensible amount of the agricultural products that we bring forth only because we have, under the protective tariff, multiplied all kinds of industries, developed our resources, multiplied every kind of business institution, and given employment at good wages to the tens of millions of people who toil.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless I should like to have the Senator from Ohio or either of the Senators inform me in what way a manufacturer in South Carolina who is shipping his product to China gets any benefit from the protective tariff here.

Mr. FORAKER. I was telling the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator then is very kind.

Mr. FORAKER. He gets the same benefit through the protective tariff that I suggested; but, Mr. President, here is the benefit which the Senator refuses to see.

Mr. TILLMAN. The difference is this——

Mr. FORAKER. He must see it. What is the cotton crop of the South?

Mr. TILLMAN. Last year about ten and a half or ten and three-quarters million bales.

Mr. FORAKER. How much of it was consumed in this country?

Mr. TILLMAN. About 4,000,000 bales.

Mr. FORAKER. Where was it sold? Who used it?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator mean the cloth? We had to send ours abroad, whereas you sold yours right around here, because it was a finer character than ours. You supply the home market with finer goods, which would be otherwise supplied by Europe if there was no protective tariff.

Mr. FORAKER. In other words, you do not make a desirable product, and therefore you can not sell it to Americans, South or North, and you send it off to the Chinaman or to somebody else who must have cotton, and he takes it from the South because he can not get it from the East.

But, Mr. President, if the Senator did not sell in this country 4,000,000 bales—and he could not if we did not have a protective system that had developed our industries and made a demand for it at home—he would have to sell the whole ten million and a half bales in China and then so glut the China market that he would not get half the price he is getting now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about going to remark that if the market were confined to China it would not be open for sixty days.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, there is another question the Senator was talking about, that the rate should be just and reasonable, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] insists that we shall strike out "fairly remunerative" and insert "just compensation." I want somebody to explain that term. The Senator is interested in the cotton mills of northern Georgia, and in North Carolina there are some, and in South Carolina, I believe, a large number.

Mr. OVERMAN. In North Carolina there are more than in any other State in the Union.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought that was true, but I was not sure about it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. Let me ask this question, and then I will yield to the Senator. Cotton is assembled at Memphis. It is a short haul across the country to the cotton mills of the South. I do not know how much it will be worth a bale to haul it across, but just for illustration we will say it is worth $2 a bale. That may be a very ridiculous figure to make; I do not know anything about what the rate should be. But it is a short haul across the country to the cotton mills of the South. It is twice or three times as long a haul from Memphis north by the way of Cincinnati and then northeast to the cotton mills of New England. And yet what is the result on rate making? The result is that unless the cotton mills of New England can get a rate that is substantially the equivalent of the rate the cotton mills of the South get, all the cotton will go to the cotton mills of the South, and the New England mills will have to go out of business. The railroads of the South, therefore, a standard being fixed on a reasonable rate to the cotton mills, conform to that, and they give the same kind of rate to New England, and thereby the New England mills get cotton.

Now, the Senator from Texas has returned. I asked him, in his absence, without observing that he was absent until I had asked it, to define this term, "just compensation;" and I was about to illustrate the difficulty I have in regard to it.

If by just compensation we are to fix a rate that measures the service rendered and we fix that rate for a haul of 400 miles across the country to the cotton mills of the South, what are we to name as a rate for 1,200 miles to the cotton mills of New England? Is it to be three times as much? It is all cotton; it all comes from the same point; it all goes to the mills; and if "just compensation" is to be the term employed, what do we mean by it? I do not ask this in a controversial sense. I ask it to get light on it. I know it is difficult, as the Senator from Texas said the other day, to adopt any term that is sufficiently definite to enable us to conform to it without having difficulty. That is the practical effect of what the Senate said.

Now, to take another case, does it cost the railroad any more, and therefore would the railroad be entitled to any more pay, if we are to measure its charge by the rule of just compensation, to haul a carload of dry goods from New York to Chicago than it would a carload of corn or pumpkins from Chicago back to the city of New York, the same distance, over the same road, and in the same car, probably, the same motive power, the same capital, the same crew who are to be employed? How are we to determine what is just compensation in the one case except only by considering what it costs the railroad company to render the service, and are we to apply that same rule in the other case?

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator desire me to interrupt him now with an answer?

Mr. FORAKER. I perhaps should not call on the Senator to do so now. I only wanted to say to the Senator that I am at a loss to know how, if I understand the term "just compensation," we could apply it without absolutely revolutionizing the whole system of rate making in the country. The Senator, as he has employed it, as I remember, has always said, "just compensation for the service rendered."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, we can establish no standard in a matter of this kind—that is, a precise one; that is, we can fix no standard with the precision with which we can weigh or count—but it seemed to me that a standard which was definite enough to protect every private citizen of the United States in his property was definite enough to protect the railroad in its service; and I chose the words "just compensation" more because they had been so repeatedly construed than for any belief that they differ from the words "just and reasonable." Indeed, sir, as I said the day before yesterday, if the law is to stand, it can only stand, in my opinion, because the court will translate the expression "just and reasonable" into the equivalent to a just compensation. I proposed the amendment more for the purpose of eliminating the objectionable words "fairly remunerative" than for any other purpose; but, proposing the change, I thought it desirable that the statute should follow the Constitution.

Now, with the Senator's permission, I want to answer his inquiry whether a haul for 1,200 miles shall be charged three times the price of a haul for 400 miles. Of course it costs the same to load and unload for a 4-mile haul as it does for a 1,200-mile haul; and making that allowance, I say to the Senator without the slightest hesitation, that I believe in a mileage basis. I do not believe the railroads of this country ought to be allowed to make things equal that God Almighty has made unequal. I do not believe they ought to be allowed to put a product from one place to another place as cheap as the people who produce that product within a hundred miles are able to put it there as against competitors for a thousand miles.

I want to add, and then I will not trespass further upon the Senator's time and the Senate's patience, that I believe every community in this land is entitled to the natural advantages of its position; and if it had not been for the advantage in freight rates which has been given to the North and East, the population of this country would have been better distributed, and its wealth would have gone with that distribution.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator has now defined "just compensation" as I thought he would be compelled to define it if I understood the sense in which he had been employing the term; in other words, it is only another way of reaching a mileage basis on which to fix rates. Let me say that is the vice, for I believe it to be a vice, of all this government rate making that has been indulged in in this country and in every other country on the globe.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Ohio will permit me to say that he connects two entirely independent answers. To say that a man is entitled to a just compensation for his service does not necessarily involve the further proposition that that service shall be measured on a mileage basis. In fact, I stated to the Senator in the very beginning of the statement, that the cost of loading and unloading was the same whether the shipment was for 4 miles or 4,000 miles. And there are other elements.

I do not pretend to say, and I would not be willing to see any law pretend to say what the elements are, because that is, as the courts said in the Monongahela case, largely a judicial question; but I simply express my own belief that it would be better to have a mileage basis, and thus give every place the natural advantages of its position. But even a mileage basis would not necessarily mean that the price for a given haul between two places of 10 miles should be exactly the same as the price for another given haul between two other places of 10 miles, because circumstances and conditions might make one a just compensation, while another either more or less than that.

Mr. FORAKER. I should have qualified the remark I made by saying the Senator would have to come, if he followed the rule he has announced, to at least approximately a mileage basis. Of course in all these illustrations you eliminate the loading and unloading. It is the haul we are talking about.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to suggest that if the principle of mileage rates is good for ordinary freight, it must be good for express matter as well. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Texas believe that we ought to compel our express companies to establish mileage rates. If it is good for that, why is it not good for the United States Government in conveying the mails? A package of second-class matter, for instance, is carried from Austin, Tex., to Boston for the same rate that it is carried from Lowell, Mass., to Boston. Now, is it a wrong that is being perpetrated upon the people? I simply suggest that if we are going to adopt this principle we ought to adopt it all along the line.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me give the Senator from Texas an illustration of each community having the benefit of its natural advantages that are given it by the Creator of the universe.

Only recently, within the last few months, I saw in a newspaper an account of the shipment of some steel rails from Pittsburg to Galveston. What was the character of that shipment? The rails were shipped first to New York and then they were shipped by rail back through Pittsburg to Galveston, and at a lower rate than could be obtained by shipping directly from Pittsburg, and enough lower to make it an inducement to go to New York to start the shipment. Why was it? Because Galveston had as to shipments made from New York an advantage the Almighty had given her that she did not have as to the shipment made from Pittsburg. When the rails were once in New York the shipper had an option to send them by ocean to Galveston or send them by rail to Galveston, and the water transportation, which the good Lord made provision for, was so much cheaper that the manufacturer at Pittsburg, not subject to that kind of competition, could more cheaply ship to New York and from there ship to Galveston.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said that the good Lord had something to do with the Galveston rate from New York.

Mr. FORAKER. I will retract that if the Senator objects to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then did the devil have anything to do with the shipment there and back to Galveston?

Mr. FORAKER. I think the good Lord made the conditions out of which it grew.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am speaking about the devil having to do with the other thing.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no devil in it; there is nothing mysterious in it; there is nothing but sound business common sense in it. Why is it that the shipper in New York can ship all the way across the continent to San Francisco at a dollar a hundred and will be charged for a shipment to Denver or Salt Lake, only half the distance, twice that much. It is because the shipper at New York can ship by water, and the railroad, if it wants the business at all, must meet water competition—that is, all the traffic will bear, if it is to go by rail.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have understood, and I think I have seen it stated, that the pottery manufacturers in England have got such a low rate across the Atlantic and by rail to Chicago that they not only ship across the ocean, but they also ship right through East Liverpool, or some other pottery-manufacturing center in his own State, and they get lower rates from Liverpool right through this place to Chicago than the East Liverpool pottery manufacturers get from East Liverpool to Chicago. I say that is infamous. Now, I will fight on that until I get it straight, if I live long enough.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have two remarks to make about that. In the first place, the shipper of pottery from England or Germany to points in the United States has the election between half a dozen different ship lines and half a dozen railroads after he gets into this country, and it is their competition, one with another, that he gets the benefit of, whereas as to East Liverpool—and there is no place in the world that I have more interest in than I have in East Liverpool, and no interest and no industry that I take more pride in than I do the pottery industry at East Liverpool—they have only one road, perhaps—I do not know what the given case may be—but it is competition that does it. It is not the rate maker. The man who fixes the rate for the carrier does not want to make a rate lower than is reasonable, but he wants to make it low enough to get the business. They make the very lowest rate they can afford.

The second thing I want to say is that I tried to get another amendment in this bill in the Interstate Commerce Committee that would at least have partially covered that very thing, but I could not get the support of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. I suppose he did not think it was efficient, but I thought it was.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand the Senator from Ohio to regret that he did not have my support for an amendment he offered in committee.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know the Senator from Iowa was in the Chamber, but I will say that I do not think I had his active support on that. I intended to refer to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not remember that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio ever came to a decision in the committee. My only opinion formed and expressed upon it was that in undertaking to settle the problem of the American merchant marine he was overburdening a somewhat heavy subject by the addition of a matter that would create more controversy than railroad rate legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the two Senators will allow me to state what I was about to state.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to comment on that last statement before he goes to a second one?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; I will do anything to oblige the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if he did not think it was wrong that the manufacturers of pottery in East Liverpool, who are endeavoring to compete with England, should have their necks broken or their profits destroyed, and the protective traiff—which he and his colleagues have been so industriously manufacturing or creating for, lo, these many years, to protect American industries—I want to know if it is right for the railroads to annul the protective tariff in the interest of American industry in order that the railroads may discriminate between Americans?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, there is a good deal that I assent to in what the Senator has said, and a good deal that I do not assent to. The protective tariff was not responsible at all for the rates that were given in the cases mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it is responsible for the growing up of the pottery industry at East Liverpool.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; the protective tariff is responsible for that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you want to break up the protective tariff and destroy its benefits to the American manufacturers there, drive them out of business, and have their industry destroyed by the unjust discriminations against them by these railroads?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator would go to East Liverpool, he would not see anybody being driven out of business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, they have been squealing because their profits are less. That they are squealing is very certain.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator had been in East Liverpool during the last Cleveland Administration he would have seen people out of business—thousands of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. And heard them "squealing," too.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; and the Senator would have heard them squealing, too—squealing loud and long. But now nobody is out of business there. I think, however, the producers of pottery at East Liverpool are subjected to a disadvantage that I would be glad to relieve them from. When we were proposing to legislate about interstate commerce, having the same power to legislate about foreign commerce that we have to legislate about interstate commerce, it was my idea that we might save for American ships all this freight brought into this country and transported into the interior by reason of this competition at lower rates than are charged on shipments from ports of entry to some of the interior points, and that those lower through rates should not be allowed unless those goods were carried in ships of American registry.

I do not think I was loading anything on here that was not proper. I do not think I was loading anything on here that we should not put on here. It is a simple proposition. The testimony shows, the statistics show, that many million dollars' worth of property is brought into this country through ports of entry and shipped to interior points on rates that are less than the rates are on the same goods from New York or Boston, or whichever port they may be imported into, to some interior point; and to that extent there is an overcoming of the protective tariff. I would be glad to give the American merchant marine an unqualified right to carry those millions of value, for it reaches to millions in the aggregate. The only thing, Mr. President, that cripples the American merchant marine is the want of business. If we could get freights for American ships, we would have again as grand and splendid a merchant marine as we had in the early days of the Republic; and here we have a chance——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. In a moment.

Here we have a chance to give to American ships some freight, to give them some business, and thereby cut off this competition that reduces these through rates. If we could give them only that which comes through the ports with these lower through rates, as we could by just adopting the ten or twenty lines that I presented to the committee, we would give our ships enough business to put them on their feet again.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if it is not a self-evident proposition that the local traffic is made to bear the burden of these transcontinental and transatlantic shipments, and that the local industries, the consumers, and everybody else concerned are taxed to support it; and whether or not that would not be remedied by putting into this bill such legislation in regard to the long and short haul as would prohibit and prevent any carrier from hauling any goods from the terminals right by the doors of somebody else in the middle of the line, and charging less for that than they charge this man in the middle for hauling either way?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I can not answer the Senator in a word, but I can conclusively answer him, I think, in a very few sentences. All the carrier can charge to carry freight from New York to San Francisco is a dollar. It is that exact figure, I believe, on first-class freight. Why? Because if the railroads charge any more the traffic will be sent by water, as the water rate is so much cheaper, and the railroad traffic must take it at a dollar or else not take it at all. Inasmuch as the railroad is in operation, has its cars, has its crews, has its entire equipment, is in business, and is going there anyway, it had better take the freight at a dollar, which may be enough to pay expenses and keep its men employed and possibly yield a very slight profit. It must take it at an unreasonably low figure or else not take the business at all; and, taking it at that, and getting employment enough to pay the men whom they must keep anyhow, and make, possibly, some slight profit, just that much is contributed to the whole sum to be earned that would not otherwise have been contributed, and to that extent the people at intermediate points are relieved.

That all goes toward lowering the rates to intermediate points. The question is not whether the rate to San Francisco is too low—for no rate is too low—but whether the rates to intermediate points are too high; but if it be only a reasonable and just rate under all the circumstances, then the railroad ought to be allowed to charge it.

Mr. TILLMAN. But does not the Senator see that all this intermediate traffic is compelled to bear the burden for the benefit of the extremities?

Mr. FORAKER. Why, Mr. President, there is no burden, unless the haul to the farther point is at a loss. We assume all the while that they are not hauling at any loss. It is better to haul at a slight profit or even for operating expenses than not to haul at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why does the Senator want the people and the industries in the interior to bear the burden of this great transcontinental haul? Why not make the fellow quit hauling if he can not haul at a profit?

Mr. FORAKER. Somebody must bear the burden; and those people who are at the terminal points, where they have the advantage of water transportation, get a low rate, and those who are at intermediate points and who can not have that advantage are subject simply to the disadvantages which the Almighty in creating this world imposed.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator was arguing against Galveston and localities on the Atlantic and on the Gulf getting the benefit the Almighty gave them, saying that the railroads were justified in shipping from Pittsburg to New York and then to Galveston——

Mr. FORAKER. I was not inveighing against Galveston getting the benefit of her natural conditions. I was speaking in favor of it. I was calling attention to the fact that she has natural advantages, and that she was getting the benefit of them. Now, let me give another illustration.

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a minute. I want to call the Senator's attention as to the justice of making the people in the interior pay for this luxury of shipping to New York and then back to Pittsburg.

Mr. FORAKER. I deny, except in some case where there is an abuse in fixing the rate, that there is any such burden unjustly imposed. The question, as I have already remarked, is whether or not the people at the intermediate points are required to pay unjust or unreasonable rates. If it be only a fair rate—and I think it is generally conceded that most of the rates that are complained of are in and of themselves just and reasonable, and unjust and unreasonable—only in relation to the longer haul—if it be of that character, then nothing is imposed upon them, unless the long haul is at a loss to the carrier, and it ought never to haul at a loss, and I do not suppose it does.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I sought to interrupt the Senator some time since to express dissent from what I understood to be his position in regard to the significance to him of the words "just and reasonable compensation," or "just compensation for services rendered." It seems to me very clear that the Commission, in determining whether a rate is just and reasonable or affords just compensation—I understood that to be the contention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]—must take into consideration all the circumstances and conditions of each case, all the elements which go to making up the rates by the railroad companies themselves. The conditions, the distance, and every other condition and circumstance must be taken into consideration.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. When I have finished the sentence.

A just and reasonable rate, or a rate which affords just compensation for the services rendered, under this bill does not necessarily mean a rate controlled, or largely controlled, by distance alone, but that competition and every other condition and circumstance must be considered in connection with it. A rate of four-tenths of a cent per ton per mile might be a just and reasonable rate under one set of circumstances and conditions, while 2 cents per ton per mile would be a just and reasonable rate under other conditions. Otherwise the enactment of this legislation would be intolerable for nine-tenths of the people of this country.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to state what seems to me to be the construction which must be put upon this bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I was seeking to get a construction of the language from the Senator who suggested it—the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Texas to assent to that proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator had said "just compensation under all the circumstances" it would have been very different.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me it could not mean anything else.

Mr. FORAKER. But those words are not employed.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Can the Senator find a constitution in this Union which says that when private property is taken for public use "just compensation under all the circumstances" shall be paid?

Mr. FORAKER. No constitution says that, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. Then why should such language have been incorporated in this bill?

I say to the Senator again, as I have said until it is a little tiresome to repeat it, that I am trying to apply to the railroads, when we come to employ their services, precisely the same test that they apply to us when they come to take our property. When a railroad reaches the Senator's property and seeks to condemn it for the purpose of constructing its line, whether under the law of Ohio or under the law of Congress, it must pay him a just compensation. That is the very language of the constitution of the Senator's State, and that is the language of the Constitution of the Republic. I simply say that when the Senator from Ohio, whether under the law of his State or under the law of the General Government, seeks to condemn the services of the railroad he ought to apply to it exactly the same standard that it has applied to him.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator as to what is found in the Constitution of the Federal Government and of Ohio; and I quite agree that when it comes to taking my property for a public use it is a judicial proceeding in which it is sought to arrive at the true value of it and to take it at its true value. That is where the trouble to me comes in the employment of this term. They do not hear anything except only what is the property worth, though, of course, they consider all its surroundings in arriving at that. When the Senator says to a railroad, "I have a carload of silk, and I want you to haul it for me from New York to Chicago;" and the railroad says, "Very well; I will take it at a just compensation," what is the measure of the just compensation? It is the service rendered. It is not that the carload of silk is worth twice as much to the Senator after he gets it to Chicago as it is before he ships it out of New York. That can not be taken into consideration any more than could the question that my property would be worth more to him after he would condemn it and pay me for it than it was while I owned it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will bear with me just a moment. What would it be worth, therefore? The Senator talks about just compensation for the service rendered. What is it worth to haul it? What some other road will haul it for, or how much capital is invested, or how many men will have to be employed, or how much motive power will be required? All those things enter into consideration if you arrive at what is a just compensation for the service rendered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. In a moment the Senator can answer. When the Senator gets to Chicago he wants to haul something back—or I do, for I am the carrier, I believe, and he is the shipper—I want to haul something back, but I can not get anything but pumpkins, possibly, or corn. I fill the car with them because somebody offers them, and we come to fixing a rate. What should the rate be? The service is precisely the same. It requires exactly the same length of time to make the haul, exactly the same number of men to constitute the crew, and the same motive power. It is the same service all the way through. What is the rule? That is what I want to get at. I am not trying to have a controversy with the Senator. I am trying to get some explanation of what is meant by a just compensation for services rendered that I can apply. I know what it means when you take a right of way through a man's farm. We all know that.

Then I want the Senator to answer another question. If this is to be——

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator will allow me to answer the question he has already put before he asks me another.

Mr. FORAKER. If he likens this procedure to taking a man's private property, such as a right of way through his farm, for the public use, and that is a judicial proceeding, what is this? If it is the same, is it not a judicial proceeding, too?

I noticed the language of the Senator a moment ago. He said that in the Monongahela case the Supreme Court of the United States held that the taking of private property for public use, as was done in that case, was practically—I believe that was the word he employed—a judicial proceeding, or virtually a judicial proceeding. The court held that it was actually a judicial proceeding—a judicial proceeding pure and simple.

Mr. BAILEY. No; they did not. They never held that in any court in the history of the world. They held the ascertainment of what just compensation was to be a judicial question; but the right to take it is not judicial.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I am talking about—the fixing of the price. The court held there, in so many words, that the fixing of a price was a judicial proceeding; that Congress had no right to fix the price, and Congress had no right to eliminate any element of value. Congress had undertaken to eliminate the value of the franchise, and said it should not be considered.

Mr. BAILEY. Now will the Senator allow me to answer?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It is somewhat surprising that a Senator with as wide an experience as the Senator from Ohio should suggest an argument on this subject that ignores the right of classification. Surely the Senator from Ohio does not suppose that any advocate of this bill would destroy the practice of classifying freight. The Senator overlooks the fact that if the railroad in carrying a carload of silk from New York to Chicago, should suffer an accident by which that carload of silk might be destroyed, it would be compelled to respond in damages fifty times as great as if it lost a carload of pumpkins. That is another consideration that makes it entirely proper that the railroad should charge more to carry the valuable cargo that increases its liability than the less valuable cargo, where, in case of accident, the loss would be merely a nominal one.

But, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator this question: Does he deny that the same perplexing difficulties exist under a law which requires you to fix "a just and reasonable rate" that exist under a law that requires you to fix a rate which affords "a just compensation?" I confess that the practical difficulty is not a small one, though I think it not an insurmountable one; but every argument against employing the expression "a just compensation" can be made with equal force and effect against fixing "a just and reasonable rate."

Now, I want to ask the Senator a question, and upon the answer to that this whole matter can conclude. Does the Senator think that the fifth amendment to the Constitution limits the power of Congress to regulate these charges?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think we would have any right to violate any provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, of course, Congress must regulate commerce under all the limitations of the Constitution. The Senator has argued that we can not regulate it in a way to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law. The Senator agrees to that, and so do I. The Senator, then, must agree that no more can we so regulate it as to deprive the carrier of its property without just compensation. Therefore if we legislate under the limitations of the fifth amendment—and I think it is generally agreed that we do—then, sir, unless "a just and reasonable rate" is a rate that affords a just compensation, your law is unconstitutional and void.

So, it seems to me that, as we are legislating under the limitations of the fifth amendment, it would be a good practice to make the statute follow the Constitution. That was the only purpose I had. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio now, if the words "fairly remunerative," which, as I think, erect a false standard, be stricken out, I am perfectly willing to yield the words "a just compensation" and adopt the words "a just and reasonable rate." They mean the same thing; and grown men ought not to wrangle as to whether the same thing will be expressed in one way or the other, when either way can be fairly understood by men of common intelligence.

Mr. FORAKER. I have said repeatedly that I have not been calling upon the Senator to accommodate me with the definition of this term with a view to having any wrangle about it I have been trying to find out what was in his mind as to the meaning of it, explaining in that connection the difficulty I have had in applying it. Now, I understand what the Senator means, and that brings me to the point I want to make in this case.

I understand him to mean that it shall be just compensation in view of the character of the commodity hauled and in view of all the circumstances; in other words, "just compensation" would mean the same thing as "just and reasonable," I presume. I thought, perhaps, that was what was in the mind of the Senator. I thought, on the other hand, it might be in the mind of the Senator that the charge should be just the same for the haul whether it was one kind of a commodity or another, and that the charge should be more in proportion for a long haul, omitting, of course, the expense of loading and unloading, than for a short haul.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. FORAKER. I will.

Mr. BAILEY. Does he think that a freight payment which would be a just compensation for a carload, to use his own illustration, of pumpkins from Chicago to New York would be a just compensation for a carload of silk from New York to Chicago?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; that is the very point I was proposing to make with respect to what the Senator said, and that is the very point that all rate makers in this country under the system now in vogue have always made with respect to the making of rates. They take into consideration when they have a carload of silk, that it is more valuable than a carload of something else, and that, if there should be a loss, there would be a greater liability.

But that brings me to the point of this whole thing. I knew the Senator would probably have to go to the mileage basis or the other plan, and when it comes to a mileage basis it would be ruin, in my judgment, to the business of this country. I do not believe 5 per cent of the shippers of the country would want us to pass this bill if they thought it meant a mileage basis.

Now, however, we have this explanation, whether it be "just compensation" or "just and reasonable" the Commission is to determine the rate. There is no standard by which it is to be determined. What is the standard to be? If the Commission is to say when it is silk, not pumpkins, not corn, not wheat, not rye, not oats, not barley, not potatoes, we have got to fix a different rate, a rate that will be in some proportion to the value of the commodity hauled and to the value added for the shipper by reason of the haul, just as they do now. What is that but discretion?

Who is going to fix that standard? That is a matter of judgment. The Senator very forcibly put that to the Senate when in his speech of a few days ago he said that was something a court was not qualified to determine; that we wanted trained men for it, men who by long service as Interstate Commerce Commissioners would come to know how to make rates better than any court could know. Why would not the court do as well? Because, Mr. President, as the Senator said, we are not establishing any standard to which the ordinary mind can conform without the exercise of judgment. There is no taking of a pencil in hand to make a mathematical calculation. It is a matter of judgment. I charge so much for hauling potatoes from A to B. Now I am asked to haul silk. How much more shall I charge? What is that but a matter of judgment? What is that but a matter of opinion? What is that but a matter of discretion; and what is the judgment or opinion or discretion involved except only legislative discretion?

That brings me to refer again to the decision in the Michigan tax case. There has been a good deal of talk about that decision; and I want to do my duty as a Senator by putting my views of this decision before the Senate. Pass this bill as it is to-day and it will perish absolutely in the first court in which it comes under review, because, if it be established, as I will concede it may be, for the sake of the argument here and now, that the power of Congress is broad enough for Congress to fix rates, and that Congress can confer this power in an administrative way on a commission, the way in which we do it must avoid this exercise of judgment and discretion or we delegate legislative power, and the law is not worth the paper on which it is written in consequence of that.

This was a case where a law had been passed in the State of Michigan to assess for purposes of taxation the value of the railroads in that State. Prior to 1902 the railroads had been taxed in that State, as I understand from the decision, a percentage of their gross earnings. In 1902 a law was passed creating a State board of assessors for the valuation of railroad property for purposes of taxation. That law prescribed that the board of assessors should fix as the value of the railroad property the average rate for taxation of the property throughout the State. In that way they found the rate, found the value, found everything that was necessary to the taxation of railroads under that law.

The contention of the railroads was, among others, that the law delegated legislative power. But the Supreme Court upheld the law as against the contention that it delegated legislative power because, as the Supreme Court said, it left nothing for the board of assessors to do except only to make a mathematical calculation, and therefore there was no delegation of legislative discretion or judgment. A standard was given, just as a standard was given in the granger law of Iowa, or the law in Wisconsin, or in other of the statutes to which I have referred. This board of assessors sat down not to say how much, in their opinion, this road shall be taxed, or that road, but to ascertain from the official figures laid before them what the average was, and that was the rate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it will not trouble the Senator, I would like to inquire what the standard was; whether it was not a standard determinable only by the exercise of judgment and discretion of the innumerable taxing boards scattered all over Michigan?

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President. The Supreme Court say that the innumerable taxing boards scattered all over Michigan—some thirteen hundred of them altogether—did their work without regard to this law. It was the form in which property was valued for taxation, and they taxed one value in one county and a different value in another, but the court said this State law has nothing whatever to do with that. This State law takes the result of all these innumerable boards. It figures out what the average is, and that it is commanded to apply to the railroads—a purely administrative duty.

Now, let me read what the court said:

> Whatever, in view of the distinct grant in the Federal Constitution to the President, Congress, and the judiciary of separately the executive, legislative, and judicial powers of the nation, may be the power of Congress in the delegation of legislative functions, a very different question is presented when the restrictions of the Federal Constitution are invoked to restrain like action in a State.

I pass over a paragraph that does not bear directly on this, and will read:

> But it is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of this question, for in the case at bar there is no abandonment by the legislature of its functions in respect to taxation. The statute prescribes as the rate of taxation upon railroad property the average rate of taxation on all other property subject to ad valorem taxes. It provides the most direct way for ascertaining such average rate, deducing it from a consideration of all the other rates. No authority is given to the local assessors to apply their judgment to the question of the railroad rate.

I call attention to that sentence as answering completely the Senator from Iowa.

> Their authority in respect to the matter of taxation is precisely the same as it was before and independently of this statute. Their duty is to act according to their judgment in respect to local taxes committed to their charge. When they have finished their action, taken, as it must be assumed to have been, in conscientious discharge of the duties assigned, from it—> from it by a simple mathematical calculation the average rate of taxation is determined. If the legislature should be convened after they have finished their action and then prescribe the average rate thus mathematically deduced as the rate of railroad taxation, no question could be made of its validity. It would be obviously a legislative determination of the rate of taxation. Is it any the less a legislative determination that it assumes that the various local officials will discharge their duties honestly and fairly, with reference to local necessities and independently of the effect upon the railroad rate, and directs that the mathematical computation be made by a board of ministerial officers, and thus made shall become the railroad rate of taxation? Why is it necessary that the legislature be convened to add its formal approval of the integrity of the action of the local officers? May it not intrust the mathematical computation to the State board of assessors; and if so, may it not likewise act upon the assumption that the local assessors will discharge their duties with an eye single to those duties and irrespective of the effect upon the railroad rate?

Now, note this language—

I have read all I care to, for I have read enough to show that that act was sustained in the language of the Supreme Court, because it conferred upon the board of assessors of the State of Michigan no legislative discretion, no judgment; no right to be exercised of discretion or judgment. It gave to them a duty purely administrative in character, because it involved nothing more than making a mathematical calculation deduced from figures as to its result, that were placed before them in an official form under the statute of the State.

Mr. BACON. I am glad the Senator from Ohio has returned to that feature of his argument. I desired to ask him a question upon it when he was speaking on it before, but he passed from that branch, and I therefore desisted. I recall, of course, as we all do, the very interesting speech made by the Senator upon a former occasion, when he discussed this question and read a number of authorities, among others, the Iowa case, and the question I desire to ask the Senator is this, as he reverts to that discussion: Does the Senator now present this argument with the same purpose that he had when he made the former speech—to demonstrate the fact that it is practically beyond the power of Congress to enact a rate law which shall be free from the constitutional objections to which he now calls our attention?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. BACON. Or has the discussion which has intervened brought the Senator to the conclusion simply that this particular bill would be unconstitutional and that there is possibly a delegation of power which would not be open to constitutional objections in the particular which he has mentioned? In other words——

Mr. FORAKER. I understand the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me, as I have not trespassed upon him at any great length. In other words, does the Senator still adhere to his original proposition that this constitutional objection is one which must necessarily be fatal to this class of legislation? Is the Senator, in the criticism which he makes of this particular bill, prepared to say whether, in his judgment, outside of a flat mileage-rate basis which he has discussed, there is any form of delegation that can be devised which would be free from the objection he now suggests to the extent that in the delegation the Congress would exhaust its legitimate function in the exercise of all which involves discretion and judgment and limit the Commission to that which is simply administrative in its character?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator asks me if I still adhere as though he saw evidences of some kind of a departure from something I have advocated heretofore.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstood that.

Mr. FORAKER. All right. Like another gentleman of whom we hear frequently, I have not changed my mind.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstood the question which I propounded. I did not intend to convey any such intimation.

Mr. FORAKER. I said, speaking last December, that conceding that Congress had the power to make rates, it could delegate that power to a commission, but it could delegate it only in an administrative way. That is what I am contending for now. I gave some illustrations of what I meant by that. It could say, in delegating that power, that the Commission should fix rates according to the mileage basis. That would be an administrative duty. They could do it by classifying the roads as Iowa and Wisconsin did. That would be administrative. I have not found any way by which we can delegate that power and make it administrative except only one or the other of those two ways, and I am opposed to both of them because I think they are both ruinous and impracticable, unless we are going to revolutionize our way of doing railroad business.

Mr. President, what I am contending for is precisely what I contended for when I first spoke here in December, when I spoke again later in December, and every time I have addressed the Senate on the subject, and I refer to it now only because this decision, having been rendered only a few days ago, gives me another authority to support the proposition I have been contending for all the while.

I want to say to the Senator that if you want a law that will stand the test of the courts and that will remedy the evils, we must overcome the difficulty presented by this and other like decisions.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. I want to say to him that the purpose I had in making the inquiry of him was twofold. I desired to know whether the Senator was still of the opinion that it is impracticable for us to frame a law which would be operative and which would not be open to constitutional objection; and, in the second place, if the Senator, who has given very great attention to this matter, and who has offered a number of amendments, or several, could assist those of us who desire to frame a law by suggesting phraseology which will make the proposed law operative, in his opinion, and free from the constitutional objections to which he has referred.

Mr. FORAKER. I have already said to the Senator, as I have said heretofore in the Senate, that I do not know of any way except two ways, which I have indicated for the purpose of illustration, to fix a definite standard that will result in the Commission having only an administrative duty to perform. It is because I do not know of any way except one or the other of those two, and both, in my judgment, are ruinous, that I want to find another way that will save us from this dangerous experiment of governmental rate making that I have undertaken to provide in this bill——

Mr. ALDRICH. There is another way, but I imagine it is hardly practicable in this country, and that is to adopt the English system, and have a commission recommend a definite schedule of rates.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, certainly, or do as is done in some of our States, where the commission makes prima facie rates, and they may go into court. But that would not meet the demand upon us. I am talking about a bill that gives the Commission power to substitute a rate and put it in operation. I know of no way except according to the standard "just and reasonable," and that I contend is an indefinite standard, which will not answer the requirements of the Constitution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he thinks it would provide a sufficient standard for the Commission if we should provide in the bill that the Commission should first have made a valuation of the roads, and that the rates should be so adjusted as to yield a fixed return of a certain percentage upon that valuation?

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would. I think the Senator from Nevada has suggested a way that might be definite enough as establishing a standard.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it will not trouble the Senator from Ohio, who has suggested three ways in which it can be done, I should like to read three lines from a decision of Judge Brewer, who was the author of the decision in the Michigan case to which the Senator has referred. I read from the case of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company v. Dey, reported in 35 Federal Reporter.

Mr. FORAKER. What State?

Mr. DOLLIVER (reading)—

> The vital question with both shipper and carrier is that the rates shall be just and reasonable, and not by what body they shall be put in force. Third. While, in a general sense, following the language of the Supreme Court, it must be conceded that the power to fix rates is legislative, yet the line of demarkation between legislative and administrative functions is not always easily discerned. The one runs into the other. The law books are full of statutes unquestionably valid, in which the legislature has been content to simply establish rules and principles, leaving execution and details to other officers. Here it has declared that rates shall be reasonable and just and committed what is, partially at least, the mere administration of that law to the railroad commissioners.

He then adds:

> While, of course, the cases are not exactly parallel—

Referring to the fixing of rates by the standard referred to by the Senator from Nevada—> yet the illustration suggests how closely administrative functions press upon legislative power and enforces the conviction that that which partakes so largely of mere administration should not hastily be declared an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

Mr. FORAKER. In the first place, I would rather have the decision of Mr. Justice Brewer delivered from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States last Monday a week than the decision of Mr. Justice Brewer delivered on the circuit when he was a circuit judge. There has been a good deal of progress made in the investigation of this subject, and it may be that the language employed by Mr. Justice Brewer read by the Senator from Iowa, was not directed to the decision of the question which we are now considering. I do not understand that it is. I do not know under the statute of what State the case arose. Will the Senator tell me?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It arose in the Iowa district. It is the case of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway v. Dey, decided January 27, 1888. I refer to it simply because it is in line with other decisions and was rendered by Mr. Justice Brewer then sitting in the circuit court, although he was, I think, on the Supreme bench.

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator find anything in that case which indicates that Mr. Justice Brewer was passing on the question whether the duty conferred on the Commission was administrative or legislative? Yes; he will say he does. How did Mr. Justice Brewer dispose of it? As the Senator has read to us, by saying that it is difficult to tell sometimes an administrative duty from a legislative duty. That is true. But Mr. Justice Brewer later, after going on the bench of the Supreme Court, in the Maximum Rate case (reported in 167 U. S.), said that the making of a rate was legislative and not administrative. So by that time he had reached a point where he was able to say without any qualification that making what was under the statute to be a just and reasonable rate was a legislative act.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to know from the Senator from Ohio whether Justice Brewer did not change his opinion in that case and whether every word in the original opinion that he delivered referring to the necessity of Congress laying down a rule was not eliminated from the opinion from which the Senator has read?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. RAYNER. I read the proof sheets of the original opinion and I have read the opinion the Senator has read from, and every word that Justice Brewer said with reference to Congress laying down a rule by which the Commission should be governed is eliminated in the modified opinion. But it did appear in the proof sheets of the original opinion, as I read them in the Supreme Court. I should like to know from the Senator from Ohio whether or not that is a correct statement.

Mr. FORAKER. There got into the newspapers—I do not know how—the original draft of the opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer in the Michigan Tax cases, as prepared by him, and as it was printed at his request before it had been submitted to his colleagues for their concurrence. When they concurred, for some reason they did strike out from that opinion some things that were in it as originally prepared by Mr. Justice Brewer, which was published in the papers, and which I have before me.

Mr. RAYNER. Did not the court strike out, in the modified opinion, the statement that Congress must lay down rules to govern the subordinate tribunal—in those very words? I looked at the proof sheets of the original opinion, and not a newspaper account of it. It shows that the court had undergone a change with reference to the proposition the Senator is arguing, that we must lay down a mathematical rule to govern the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not care to read, and for reasons the Senator will appreciate I do not care to discuss, what appeared in the newspapers and was not part of the opinion as delivered from the bench.

I do not know that the exact words the Senator from Maryland employs were in this original draft, and therefore I can not say just what was stricken out. I only know that as it originally stood it seemed to me to be an absolute foreclosure of this whole question. But I contend that with those words stricken out the effect of the decision is just what I have been contending for. The court upheld the law and said it is free from the charge of delegating legislative power, because they say the board under that law had to perform only an administrative duty—making a mathematical calculation. That is all I claim for the opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right here on that point? How does he harmonize this view with the Tea case, decided about a year ago, where the only standard was that we should exclude any teas of an inferior grade? The question of inferiority, it seems to me, must have involved judgment. It is a question which would require investigation and a conclusion based upon the judgment formed from that investigation. I confess for myself I have not been able to harmonize that case with some of these other decisions.

Mr. FORAKER. The distinction I would make as to that case—and I can realize how the Senator has some embarrassment on account of it, for it gave me some when I first read it—is that it does practically establish a definite standard, for it commands the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of experts to employ the recognized standards by which to determine what is an inferior quality for cup tea, and that is treated as though it is something well understood, and in conforming to that there was practically no exercise of discretion.

The statute goes further and it provides that the tea must be boiled thus and so—immersed in boiling water; I have forgotten what the expression is. I have not looked at that case for some months. But I think if the Senator studies it he will find that that is what perhaps was in the mind of the court, and no doubt enabled the court to differentiate that case from the other. Whatever may be the tea case, here is an opinion handed down a week ago last Monday; it is the very latest utterance from the Supreme Court; and it does say what I have contended for. I do not want to discuss what is not in the case.

Mr. BAILEY. I assume, whatever may be the Senator's opinion upon the merits of the legislation, that he is anxious, if a bill passes, that it shall be constitutional. I am not one of those who insist that this question has ever been decided by the Supreme Court, and I recognize that it may be a very close question, too, as to the power of Congress to authorize the Commission to fix rates. I will venture, however, to express the opinion that the Supreme Court will sustain that power if granted in those direct terms.

But I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if the matter can not be made more certain in this way: That we authorize the Commission to establish a rate, either a rate that is just and reasonable or a rate that affords a just compensation, as we may determine, and then provide that the rate so prescribed shall thereafter be the lawful rate? It would seem, then, if you go into the court to attack that rate, you are not really attacking the rate made by the Commission, but you are attacking the rate which Congress has declared to be the law of the land. Certainly, if the power can be lodged with the Commission in any way, that is the safest way in which to do it.

Mr. FORAKER. I perhaps would agree with the Senator from Texas, upon further thought, and I have no disposition to take exception to his suggestion now. It may be a way out of it to those who want this kind of a bill.

But now I get back to my amendment; and I have detained the Senate so much longer than I should have done that I hope I may be allowed to conclude. All this effort has been to show that this bill is, as the Senator from Texas has just said, a bill which, if it becomes a law, may be held by the court to be unconstitutional. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I have not any more doubt about the unconstitutionality of this bill, not only on that one ground, but other grounds which I have heretofore enumerated and detailed, than I have that I am here discussing it this afternoon—I have not a bit more doubt—and I do not see how anybody else could have any doubt about it.

But, now, Mr. President, whether or not I am right about it that it is unconstitutional, we are all of one mind, in agreement with the Senator from Texas, that these are serious questions, and if we can, in legislating on this subject, make this bill constitutional, we should do it, and I am going to labor in every way I can to help to do it. We should, however, in addition to that—for I do not see how you are going to establish a standard that will relieve you from the question of the delegation of legislative power—as I have proposed, attach an amendment as an additional section that will broaden and strengthen the Elkins law, so that if this should fail we will have that remedy, a better remedy than the law as it is affords. There is nothing in this amendment that is in conflict with a word in the Hepburn bill. It is not in conflict with any provision of it. It simply provides that when a complaint is made before the Commission the Commission shall exercise its powers of conciliation, if they are sufficient, and if not, it shall send the complaint to the proper court having jurisdiction, there to be tried in a suit brought by the Government at the expense of the Government, without any expense whatever to the shipper, and the provision of this amendment is that the proceedings there shall be expedited.

It provides also a remedy as against excessive rates. The law as it now is commands just and reasonable rates; that is, the lawful rate, a just and reasonable rate. Much more will that be so when we pass this amendment, because it emphasizes that. If a shipper shall come and complain that a rate which has been put in operation is unjust and unreasonable because excessive, he can have his remedy before the Commission, under the Hepburn bill, after a full hearing to be reviewed in court, if we put a broad review amendment on it, or he can apply at once under this to the court for relief, and the court, in my opinion, has full power to enjoin what is in excess of the lawful rate.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio, before he takes his seat, if he considers that his amendment would be a sufficient justification for him to vote for the bill with all the other provisions in it?

Mr. FORAKER. I would not like to vote for the bill with the provisions in it that are in it, because I doubt their constitutionality. I do not like to vote for a measure that I think is unconstitutional. But with all my brother Senators differing from me on that point, I might, if I thought I was getting something that would bring real relief, be willing to forego a great deal.

Mr. MORGAN. After we had gotten the bill in shape to satisfy the Senator from Ohio, would he see any objection of a commercial, constitutional, or legal sort to a provision in the bill covering transportation over the rivers and water courses?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I contended for that in the committee, if the Senator please, and I contended for it in a speech here; that is to say, I contended for it in the sense that I pointed out that the bill does not extend to interstate commerce carried on upon the rivers. I live on the river at Cincinnati, and we have commercial relations with New Orleans. It is interstate commerce.

Mr. MORGAN. Why should it not extend to rivers as well as to railroads?

Mr. FORAKER. It should extend to the rivers as well as to the railroads, not on account of excessive rates, because the water rates are excessively low and nobody complains of them, but because they give rebates and because they discriminate both on the rivers and on the lakes.

Mr. MORGAN. Then why not extend the measure over the navigable waters of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. I think we should extend it, as I say, over the lakes and over the rivers. I think this bill should apply to interstate commerce carried on all interstate carriers, no matter whether by rail or by water. That is my contention about it. I think the Senator from Alabama was right in his contention in that respect.

Mr. President, I wanted to cite some authorities, but it is late, and I will forego that if the Senate will allow me to reserve the right to do it at some later time. I mean some authorities to show that it is competent for Congress to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to bring suits either in its own name or in the name of the Government without expense to the shipper to enjoin excessive rates. I have a number of decisions to that effect, if anybody challenges it at any time.

Now, I want Senators to take this matter into consideration. I take it every man here wants to so legislate as to afford a remedy against the evils that have been complained of. Every man here knows that no remedy will be afforded if we pass an unconstitutional law. Every man here knows the law we have known as the "Elkins law" has been an efficient law in so far as it has been put to the test. Every man here knows that if we broaden the provisions of that law in the way I propose it will not conflict with this other legislation, and if other legislation about which we all must have apprehension as to its constitutionality should fail in the courts we will then have a better law, and then all this effort we are making will not have been in vain.

APPENDIX.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. FORAKER to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, viz: Insert the following:

SEC. —. That section 3 of the act approved February 19, 1903, entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have reasonable ground for belief that any common carrier is engaged in the carriage of passengers or freight traffic between given points at less than the published rates on file, or is, either singly or in cooperation with one or more other carriers, publishing and charging unjust or unreasonable rates therefor, or is committing any discriminations forbidden by law, whether as between shippers, places, commodities, or otherwise, and whether effected by means of rates, rebates, classifications, preferentials, private cars, refrigerator cars, switching or terminal charges, elevator charges, failure to supply shippers equally with cars, or in any other manner whatsoever, it shall, if the complainants so request or if for any reason it prefer or deem advisable to proceed under the provisions of this section instead of under the other provisions of this act, be its duty, if such carrier or carriers will not, after due notice, desist from such violation of the law, to file with the Attorney-General a brief statement of its grounds for such belief and the evidence in support thereof, and thereupon, under his direction, and in the name of the United States, a petition shall be presented alleging such facts to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity having jurisdiction; and when the act complained of is alleged to have been committed or as being committed in part in more than one judicial district or State, it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any one of such judicial districts or States, whereupon it shall be the duty of the court summarily to inquire into the facts and circumstances, upon such notice and in such manner as the court shall direct and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, and to make such other persons or corporations parties thereto as the court may deem necessary; and upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enjoin, according to the ground of complaint, the publishing and charging of all of any such rate or rates so complained of, in excess of what the court shall find to be reasonable and just, which shall continue to be the lawful rate as heretofore and now prescribed by statute; such injunction to continue in force during such period as the same or substantially the same conditions may continue, as are established by the evidence in such case; or shall enforce an observance of the published tariffs if they are found to be just and reasonable; or direct and require a discontinuance of such discriminations, by such proper orders, writs, and process as will, as nearly as may be, prohibit unlawful discriminations as to both persons and places and secure equality of right and treatment to all shippers and localities, which said orders, writs, and process may be enforceable as well against the parties interested in the traffic as against the carrier or carriers complained of; and all proceedings hereunder shall be subject to the right of appeal to the Supreme Court as now provided by the act of February 11, 1903, to expedite the hearings of suits in equity; but such appeal shall not operate to stay or supersede the order of the court or the execution of any writ or process thereon, unless the circuit or Supreme Court, on application therefor made for good cause, so order. It shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, whenever the Attorney-General shall direct, either of his own motion or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to institute and prosecute such proceedings, and the proceedings provided for by this act shall be prosecuted at the cost of the United States or the railroad company or companies as the court may adjudge equitable and just, and such proceedings shall not preclude the bringing of suit for the recovery of damages by any party injured, or any other action provided by said act approved February 4, 1887, entitled 'An act to regulate commerce' and the acts amendatory thereof. And in proceedings under this act and the acts to regulate commerce the said courts shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, both upon the part of the carrier and any shipper or shippers who may be interested, who shall be required to answer on all subjects relating directly or indirectly to the matter in controversy, and to compel the production of all books and papers, both of the carrier and the shipper or shippers, which relate directly or indirectly to such transaction; the claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or such corporation producing its books and papers, but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence or information, documentary or otherwise, in such proceeding: Provided, That the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity pending or hereafter brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that may be hereafter enacted, approved February 11, 1903,' shall apply to any case prosecuted under the direction of the Attorney-General in the name of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

SEC. —. That nothing in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, or in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, or in any act amendatory of either of said acts, shall hereafter apply to the establishment of rates or the changing or publication of the same with respect to foreign commerce, or shall prohibit any necessary and reasonable agreement of two or more carriers with respect to rates or charges and the maintenance and observance of the same for interstate transportation that is not in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce with foreign nations or among the several States.

An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

Be it enacted, etc., That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons except as such penalties are herein changed. The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law, shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense; and it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced. Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000. In all convictions occurring after the passage of this act for offenses under said acts to regulate commerce, whether committed before or after the passage of this act, or for offenses under this section, no penalty shall be imposed on the convicted party other than the fine prescribed by law, imprisonment wherever now prescribed as part of the penalty being hereby abolished. Every violation of this section shall be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed or through which the transportation may have been conducted; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier acting within the scope of his employment shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier as well as that of the person. Whenever any carrier files with the Interstate Commerce Commission or publishes a particular rate under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or acts amendatory thereto, or participates in any rates so filed or published, that rate as against such carrier, its officers, or agents in any prosecution begun under this act shall be conclusively deemed to be the legal rate, and any departure from such rate, or any offer to depart therefrom, shall be deemed to be an offense under this section of this act.

SEC. 2. That in any proceeding for the enforcement of the provisions of the statutes relating to interstate commerce, whether such proceedings be instituted before the Interstate Commerce Commission or be begun originally in any circuit court of the United States, it shall be lawful to include as parties, in addition to the carrier, all persons interested in or affected by the rate, regulation, or practice under consideration, and inquiries, investigations, orders, and decrees may be made with reference to and against such additional parties in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions as are or shall be authorized by law with respect to carriers.

SEC. 3. That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have reasonable ground for belief that any common carrier is engaged in the carriage of passengers or freight traffic between given points at less than the published rates on file, or is committing any discriminations forbidden by law, a petition may be presented alleging such facts to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity having jurisdiction; and when the act complained of is alleged to have been committed or as being committed in part in more than one judicial district or State, it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in either such judicial district or State, whereupon it shall be the duty of the court summarily to inquire into the circumstances, upon such notice and in such manner as the court shall direct and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, and to make such other persons or corporations parties thereto as the court may deem necessary, and upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enforce an observance of the published tariffs or direct and require a discontinuance of such discrimination by proper orders, writs, and process, which said orders, writs, and process may be enforceable as well against the parties interested in the traffic as against the carrier, subject to the right of appeal as now provided by law. It shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, whenever the Attorney-General shall direct, either of his own motion or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to institute and prosecute such proceedings, and the proceedings provided for by this act shall not preclude the bringing of suit for the recovery of damages by any party injured, or any other action provided by said act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof." And in proceedings under this act and the acts to regulate commerce the said courts shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, both upon the part of the carrier and the shipper, who shall be required to answer on all subjects relating directly or indirectly to the matter in controversy, and to compel the production of all books and papers, both of the carrier and the shipper, which relate directly or indirectly to such transaction; the claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or such corporation producing its books and papers, but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in such proceeding: Provided, That the provisions of an act entitled "An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity pending or hereafter brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that may be hereafter enacted, approved February 11, 1903," shall apply to any case prosecuted under the direction of Attorney-General in the name of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not affect causes now pending nor rights which have already accrued, but such causes shall be prosecuted to a conclusion and such rights enforced in a manner heretofore provided by law and as modified by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

Public, No. 103. Approved February 19, 1903, second session, Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in regard to some figures that were given about the spindles, which I think were incorrectly given, I sent for the volume of the Census on Cotton Manufactures, in order to see what the figures were in 1900. I find that the total number of active spindles in cotton mills—and I may say a note states that in 1900 there were no idle spindles in the United States—not in knit goods or hosiery or worsted, but in cotton mills alone, there were in the New England States 12,850,000 spindles; in the Southern States, 4,298,000 spindles. In Massachusetts there were 7,784,000 spindles, 3,000,000 more than in all the Southern States. So I think there must be a mistake in the figures given by the Senator from North Carolina, as I understood them.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has the statistics for 1900, I believe.

Mr. LODGE. I have.

Mr. FORAKER. The statistics for the last year show that there has been such an increase of cotton mills and spindles in the South that there is a very slight difference between the number in New England and in the Southern States.

Mr. LODGE. I have been looking at the statistics as nearly as I could get them. In the last five years there has been an increase in the value of Massachusetts cotton products of something over 10 per cent, and the number of spindles I know keep pace with it. They put more spindles in the city of Lawrence last year than were ever put in in the history of the city. It would make in the State of Massachusetts over 8,000,000 spindles. I am almost certain that the Senator's figures can not be right.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not pretend to contend as against the Senator, but I do remember having seen a statement of that kind; I do not know just where.

Mr. LODGE. Of course there are no complete figures later than the census of 1900. The value of cotton goods in Massachusetts was $110,000,000; in South Carolina, second, $30,000,000. Those were the latest figures I was able to get. One hundred and ten million dollars was the value in Massachusetts, and South Carolina came second with $30,000,000. The increase in the South in the decade from 1890 to 1900 was something phenomenal. South Carolina increased 1,000,000 spindles and North Carolina about 800,000 spindles. Unless I am very greatly at fault there has been no such increase in the last five years.

Mr. FORAKER. The statement I saw was to the effect that the increase had been so phenomenally great that now the number of spindles in the South was almost equal to the number of spindles in New England; and it was also to the effect that the quality of cotton manufactures in the South was rapidly increasing, that a much finer quality now than heretofore has been produced. For a long time it was thought that the climatic conditions were such that fine manufactures of cotton goods could be made only at the New England mills, but they are now finding that there is no such difference.

Mr. BACON. As to the number of spindles, I think the Senator will find from an investigation that the amount of raw cotton manufactured in the South is equal if not a little greater than that manufactured in the North.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator let me call his attention to one fact? I do not care to get into any controversy with New England. I hope New England will continue to prosper.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. Of course I have nothing of that sort in mind.

Mr. CLAY. In 1904, 10,002,000 bales of cotton were produced. The northern mills consumed 2,046,000 bales, and the South 1,889,000 bales. My understanding is that in the year 1905 the probable amount of cotton consumed in the South will equal that in the northern mills. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that during the last three or four years we have advanced on that line very rapidly.

Mr. LODGE. I know it.

Mr. CLAY. And at no distant day, doubtless, the South will manufacture a large part of the cotton produced in the South. I wish also to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the year 1896 we consumed only about one-half of what we consumed in the year 1904.

Mr. LODGE. The growth has been phenomenal.

Mr. CLAY. It has been phenomenal.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, of course, will remember that as to the number of spindles the amount of cotton consumed is not quite a fair test, because the New England goods are finer goods, and, I think, the weight on the whole will be less.

Mr. CLAY. I am informed by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER]—I think he has probably the calculation—that in 1905 the South consumed in her mills 2,025,000 bales.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt of that. I know the increase has been very great. But, Mr. President, the questions of statistics are only leading up to the point I wanted to make, which came out in this debate which I think is a very important point, and that is the distinction between rates on exports and rates on imports. There is not a country in the world to-day, whether they have government rates or private ownership or government control, that does not make low rates for its exports. It makes lower rates for its exports than for anything else in order to reach the foreign market. Nobody can doubt the justice of that. Any law which attempted to stop a lower rate on exports would be one of the most severe blows that could be dealt to the business of the country.

On the other hand, Mr. President, take the imports coming in. The people on the seacoast, the people of New York, Boston, and Baltimore, who get goods delivered from the ship plus the duty, get the full protection of the law; but between those seaboard points and the interior points, by reducing rates on imports, the railroads annul, in many cases, the operation of the tariff.

It is not my intention to argue the question of the merits of the protective tariff, but we have a protective tariff. Everybody is entitled to an equal measure of protection, and discriminations should not be made in railroad rates which result in annulling the laws of the United States.

I consider it absolutely false economy to undertake by railroad rates to secure to a particular region what is called its natural advantages; but when railroad rates are used to nullify the laws of the United States, which must be equal to all the people of the United States, you open up an entirely different question.

Therefore, we are confronted with what I consider two propositions which we can not escape. One is that we ought to make low rates for exports going out. The other is that we ought not to give such advantages to the rates on imports coming in that the inhabitants of the seaboard get one measure of protection from the laws and the inhabitants of the interior get another measure of protection, so that an import which can not compete in the cities of the seaboard goes into the cities of the West, owing to the effect of the railroad rate discriminations, at a price which enables it to overcome the protective tariff and compete prejudicially with the native production.

Those two instances alone, Mr. President, show the utter impossibility of establishing a hard and fast system of distance or mileage rates. You destroy the business of the country by any such system as that. Whoever is going to regulate our rates has got to be given the power to discriminate as to exports and see that there is no discrimination perhaps as to imports. I say—I am illustrating in only one single direction—but I say when you are putting such a vast power as that into the hands of any body of men, it behooves us to guard it with extreme care.

I only made this point because the Senator from Ohio was discussing it this afternoon.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. It is late, and there ought to be an executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 13, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, NEAH BAY, WASH.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 5026.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 5026) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in the State of Washington, and for the construction of a first-class ocean-going tug to be used in connection therewith, for life-saving purposes in the vicinity of the north Pacific coast of the United States, and so forth.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station at or near Neah Bay, in the State of Washington, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend, said station, in addition to the usual equipment, to be supplied with two self-righting and self-bailing lifeboats.

SEC. 2. That for use in connection with said life-saving station there shall be constructed a first-class ocean-going tug, for service in saving life and property in the vicinity of the north Pacific coast of the United States, which said tug shall be equipped with wireless-telegraph apparatus, surfboats, and such other modern life and property saving appliances as may be deemed useful in assisting vessels and rescuing persons and property from the perils of the sea.

SEC. 3. That for the operation of said tug the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to employ a proper crew, including the necessary officers, engineers, firemen, and so forth, and the vessel shall be under the control and direction of the keeper of the life-saving station hereby authorized to be established.

SEC. 4. That to carry into effect the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1, at the end of line 8, after the word "lifeboats," change the period to a comma and add the following: "at a cost not to exceed $30,000."

On page 1, lines 9 and 10, strike out the following: "for use in connection with said life-saving station."

On page 1, in line 10, after the word "construct," insert the following: "for and under the supervision of the Revenue-Cutter Service."

On page 2, line 5, after the word "sea," change the period to a comma and insert the following: "at a cost not to exceed $170,000."

On page 2 strike out all of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "SEC. 3. That said tug shall be manned and operated by the Revenue-Cutter Service, and, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall cooperate with the life-saving station hereby authorized to be established."

On page 2 strike out all of section 4.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 16953. The Clerk will commence to read where he discontinued yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of mails, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, finance clerks, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendent of registry, and superintendents of stations, twenty-nine, at not exceeding $2,200 each.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the six superintendents provided for on page 5, lines 16, 17, and 18, is a change of existing law—the superintendents in New York?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no change of the actual employees or their salaries in that item.

Mr. JOHNSON. I notice that in the testimony before the committee they pressed very earnestly for an increase in the salaries of certain of the superintendents in New York, wishing to amend the law of 1889.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No change was made in that item.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am glad to know it. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, sixty, at not exceeding $1,800 each.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the last word. I notice on line 1, page 7, "private secretaries, at $1,800 each." I want to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana what is the necessity for a postmaster having a private secretary in addition to the other clerical force in the office?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will stop to consider the amount of work falling to a postmaster in one of the larger offices of the country, he will at once appreciate the necessity of a private secretary. In the smaller offices no provision is made for a private secretary, but in the larger offices, in the way of correspondence and in the way of filing of official correspondence, falling directly under the office of the postmaster, there is a great deal of work. Indeed, the committee have been urged very strongly to give additional compensation to the private secretaries in some of the larger offices of the country. There is a great necessity for it, in my judgment. The committee have simply continued the same arrangement that has existed for some time with respect to those private secretaries. It has provided for no additional number, nor has it provided for any increase of compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I noticed in the hearings that the committee were very strongly urged to provide stenographers or correspondence clerks. I am very much gratified to see from the bill that they did not make that provision; but, as I read the testimony, the plea was that the postmasters came in with private secretaries who were not efficient, who did not understand the workings of the post-office, and, therefore, it was urged that these correspondence clerks to assist the postmasters should be taken from the regular force, they being men already in the service and who understood the work of the office. Now, I thought if it were necessary to take these experienced clerks out of the service to assist the postmasters and call them correspondence clerks, I could not see any necessity for going outside of the civil-service law and allowing the postmaster to name the private secretary, who would have to be instructed in the work. I am glad the committee did not yield to the importunities of the Department; but I am not sure that it would not be better to strike from this bill the provision for private secretaries who are not under the civil service and to have experienced correspondence clerks who are under the civil service, so that the postmaster's private secretary would really be a man who was efficient and thoroughly informed in the post-office work.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The committe resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, when the subject of incorporating the National Educational Association was before this House a few days ago, I did not have an opportunity to say a word upon the subject, and as a member of the Committee on Education who carefully considered and cordially supported the measure in committee, I feel that I would be derelict in my duty, not only to the other members of the committee, but to the cause of education, if I remained altogether silent upon this, a subject in which I have always been deeply interested. Not only so, but I do not feel that I would be doing justice to my constituents nor to the State of Maryland, which I have the honor in part to represent.

The superintendent of public education in the State of Maryland, Dr. Martin Bates Stephens, speaking for the teachers of that great Commonwealth, strongly recommended and advocated the passage of this measure, and vouches for the correctness of the statement that the vast majority of the active members of the National Educational Association most heartily indorse the rechartering of the association as outlined by this bill. I will further state that Doctor Stephens has risen from the ranks of the country school teachers to the prominent position he now holds in the State and nation as a successful educator, and hence his advocacy—in the State of Maryland, at least—of measures along educational lines is given great weight. I have here a letter from Doctor Stephens and also one from the superintendent of public schools in Baltimore city, Dr. James H. Van Sickle, which, with the permission of the Chair and the House, I will print in the RECORD with my remarks.

The letters referred to are as follows:

STATE OF MARYLAND,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC EDUCATION,
OFFICE OF THE STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION,
Annapolis, February 19, 1906.

Hon. THOMAS A. SMITH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I write to you in the interest of the bill now before the House of Representatives asking for an extension of the charter of the National Educational Association. For six years I have served as a director of this association for the State of Maryland, and as such I have enjoyed good opportunities to study its management and policy. It has grown to be the greatest educational association in the world, and because of its national character and work I think it is entirely appropriate for the extension of its charter to be made by Congress. The membership of the National Educational Association has reached as high as 35,000, and includes nearly all the wide-awake educators and school supervisors of the United States, not to speak of school principals and teachers. It has given purpose to public education, and through the influences of this organized body order has come out of chaos, and the American school system is taking higher rank every year at home and abroad. Through the standing committees of this association every phase of education has been enriched, and the whole movement toward the essentials of uniformity received its impetus from the work of these committees.

It is true that the same men who formulated the policy of this association are still the guiding spirits in the deliberations of this body, but why should they not be? Who could have done the work better? No one can think of the history of this great organization of teachers without thinking of Commissioner W. T. Harris, Drs. Nicholas Murray Butler, Albert M. Lane, John W. Cook, F. Louis Soldan, J. M. Greenwood, and others—the two are inseparable. But under such able leadership and good management the splendid results of the National Educational Association are our heritage, and in my opinion the indorsement which the extension of the charter by Congress would imply is richly deserved and should be given to the men who are still controlling its affairs and who, so far as I know, have never abused a trust or proved derelict to a duty committed to them.

I hope you will see your way clear to vote for the bill. Its passage means a continuation of the good work so nobly begun.

I am, yours, very truly,

M. BATES STEPHENS.

BALTIMORE PUBLIC SCHOOLS, February 15, 1906.

Hon. THOMAS A. SMITH, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The charter of the National Educational Association expires by limitation on February 24, 1906. The bill for rechartering the association, known as H. R. 10501, is, in the judgment of a great majority of the members of the association, one that ought to receive the support of Congress. I, personally, believe it to be a good bill.

Trusting that it may receive your support, I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

J. H. VAN SICKLE.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is claimed by a small minority of the active members of the association that the words "United States" should not be added to the name of this National Educational Association, and that it should not have a national character, because progress and advancement have been made under the old name. I am inclined to the opinion that there is not much in a name, except as the acts of the individual or individuals make the name honorable and exalted, and while I have heard a great deal said during the last few months about the dishonor attached to the names of some individuals, legislative and business bodies of the United States of America, I am still inclined to think there is yet enough true manhood and statesmanship in this country to make the addition to the words "United States" an honorable and exalted appendage to the name of any society of this country; and, in fact, the more efficient and honorably conspicuous the society or organization, the more fitting and appropriate the addition of the words that still carry with them the pride and glory of the nation. It was contended by a few persons who came before the Committee on Education that this bill took away from the active members of the association the right of the initiative of the control and expenditure of the funds of this association. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a business man or Member of this House but who knows and understands that every successful business institution anywhere in this country is represented by directorates, executive boards, etc., to regulate and govern its affairs.

It would be practically impossible to accomplish anything without gathering responsibility into capable executive hands. Stockholders elect directors, directors their officers and executive boards, and as they show inefficiency or dishonor they are relegated to the rear and new directorates are formed.

Why, sir, in a large body like the National Educational Association there must be concentration into the hands of executive committees. At the Ocean Grove meeting of the association there were 20,000 members present, and in Boston, Mass,, the association numbered about 35,000. Imagine this House of 386 Members attempting to do business without stringent rules and standing committees, if you please, and the result would be pandemonium would reign. Now, if you please, bring into the House the 80,000,000 active and associate members of this country and where would we be? Why, Mr. Chairman, the very foundation of the Government of this country is based upon similar principles of those of the association of which I am speaking. The House of Representatives, for instance, is supposed to be the initiator of expenditures, the Senate concurring or nonconcurring, and if the active members—the voters—disapprove our action they delegate at the polls a new directorate to be sent to Washington to administer public affairs according to the will of the people, and I have no doubt the active members of the National Educational Association of the United States will do the same thing with their directorate if necessity arises. I regard this measure as a progressive measure in the right direction, and hope the Senate will pass it as it went from this House. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, chief stamp clerks, clerks, finance clerks, foremen of crews, printers, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, $1,820, at not exceeding $1,200 each.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 20, page 9, by striking out the word "and" before the word "superintendents," and inserting, after the word "stations," the following: "and machinist."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In page 9, line 20, strike out the third word, "and," and after "stations" insert "and machinists."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Carpenters, clerks, clerks in charge of stations, pressmen, printers, and private secretaries, $3,490, at not exceeding $900 each.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "and," the second word in line 10, and inserting, after the word "secretaries," the words "and oilers."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 10, strike out the word "and" before "private;" and after "secretaries" insert the words "and oilers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Carpenters, clerks, clerks in charge of stations, janitors, laborers, messengers, porters, pressmen, and watchmen, 3,500, at not exceeding $600 each.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 20 and 21, page 10, the words "three thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "four thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 20 and 21 strike out the words "three thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "four thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 22, add the following: "Provided, That 100 of the additional clerks of this grade shall be immediately available and designated for service at the Chicago office."

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, one word of explanation as to the purpose of this amendment. Reference to the post-office bill discloses the fact that no appropriations are made for individual offices. The number of clerks are appropriated for in gross, and so in the case of the other officials and subordinates in the Post-Office Department. These clerks and other officials are assigned to the various offices by the Post-Office Department.

Let me call your attention to one illustration. On page 5, in line 3, we have the following provisions: "Superintendent of delivery, superintendent of mails, superintendent of money orders, and superintendent of registry—four—at not exceeding $3,200 each."

Then follow other provisions for similar officials at lower salaries. There is nothing in this bill which says to what offices those officials are to be assigned. As a matter of fact, these four officers receiving the maximum amount of $3,200 are all assigned to the New York office. Similar officials assigned to the Chicago office receive only $3,000. There is no good reason for this discrimination growing out of either the character of the services rendered or the amount of business transacted in the Chicago office. Chicago is a close second to New York in gross post-office earnings. The seventeen largest offices in the country with their gross receipts are:

Gross revenue 1905:

New York, N. Y	$15,486,462
Chicago, Ill	11,648,295
Philadelphia, Pa	4,891,958
Boston, Mass	4,501,163
St. Louis, Mo	3,558,691
Brooklyn, N. Y	2,016,869
Cincinnati, Ohio	1,871,731
San Francisco, Cal	1,655,842
Pittsburg, Pa	1,622,343

Minneapolis, Minn	1,244,142
Buffalo, N. Y	1,188,957
Milwaukee, Wis	1,046,830
Washington, D. C	1,041,863

During the past twenty-five years the receipts of the Chicago office have increased 828 per cent, while the expenses have only increased 716 per cent, as will be seen from these figures which have been furnished me by the very able, progressive, and public-spirited official who now presides over the Chicago post-office:

Year.	Receipts.	Expenses.

As will be seen, the receipts of the Chicago office have more than doubled in the past seven years. The salaries in the Chicago office should in all cases be on a par with the salaries in the New York office. But in some instances the discrepancy is very great. Take another illustration in addition to the one that I have just given. Among the twenty-five officials provided for in the last paragraph, on page 5, you will notice one private secretary, at $2,400. There is nothing in this bill to show where that secretary is employed. As a matter of fact, this one private secretary at $2,400 is assigned to the New York office, while the private secretary to the postmaster at Chicago receives only $1,700. Now, I not only know something of the work of the Chicago office, but I personally know all about the character and ability of the private secretary in that office. There is no better posted or more efficient employee in the Government service. If the private secretary in the New York office is equal in knowledge and ability to the private secretary in the Chicago office he is well worth $2,400, but there is no reason why the Chicago official should not receive the same amount. There is, I repeat, nothing in this bill to show why the $2,400 secretary should be assigned to New York and the $1,700 secretary to Chicago.

When it comes to the clerks this method of appropriation and this method of designation often result before the end of the fiscal year in disclosing the fact that some office is insufficiently provided with clerks for the balance of the year. That is the present case with the Chicago office; therefore the necessity for this amendment. It is and should be the policy of this Government to so appropriate for clerks at all the offices, including the Chicago office, that they may work the various offices upon as nearly as possible an eight-hour basis. That is the recognized policy of the Government, and it should be our function to cooperate with this policy and to appropriate, so far as possible, so that the clerks in the offices may be assigned and work upon the eight-hour basis. The necessities in the Chicago office some weeks ago compelled the insertion of an amendment in the deficiency bill while pending in the Senate, so as to provide 250 clerks for the Chicago office during the balance of this fiscal year. The appropriation was made in accordance with this amendment in the Senate, generously conceded and agreed to by the conferees on the part of the House as soon as the facts were made known to them. When, however, it came to the distribution and designation of these clerks, instead of 250 going to Chicago, where they were needed, only 135 of these additional clerks have been assigned to the Chicago office. At the present time the distributors in the Chicago office are working substantially on a ten-hour schedule. In other words, during the past six months the distributers in the Chicago office have been working as high, some of them, as twelve hours a day, bringing, as I say, the average up to nearly ten hours. It is to remedy this deficiency in the present force at Chicago that I offer this amendment, so that during the balance of this fiscal year we shall have substantially in the Chicago office what was intended when that amendment to which I have referred was passed by the Senate and agreed to by the House conferees. The present postmaster is directing great energy and unsurpassed business ability to administer the affairs of his great office as efficiently as can be done with the force at his command. It is for us to appropriate for a sufficient number of clerks to keep all the post-offices in the country on an eight-hour basis. For this reason I urge the adoption of this amendment to meet the present emergency in the Chicago office, in compliance with the request of the Chicago postmaster.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Chicago moves to strike out the last word of his colleague's amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say the total number of clerks throughout the country in the Post-office Department is 25,496. Of this number 2,526 are in the Chicago office.

The average time worked by the men in the Chicago office is nine hours and forty minutes.

The number of hours overtime equals 309 men daily on an eight-hour basis.

Chicago's postal business has grown from $1,254,921.61 in 1880 to $11,648,547.36 in 1905.

The expense has grown from $480,191.41 in 1880 to $3,922,-652.64 in 1905.

The salaries paid to the men employed are on the average much less than they should be. This is particularly true as to the men who are engaged as distributers in the mailing division, who only get $600 per annum with no fixed ratio of advancement.

The distributers are the backbone of the service, yet they have been overlooked to a greater extent in the matter of promotion than any other class of the service.

Requests are seldom, if ever, received for transfer from any other department of the post-office to the mailing division, where the distribution of transit mail is performed. On the other hand, 60 per cent of the men in that division have filed applications for transfer to the money order, registry, or city divisions.

The class of service these men render is worthy of much better compensation than they now receive. They should start into the service at $800 and secure steady promotion, if they are qualified to remain in the service, until they reach $1,200.

It is only in this way the Government can hope to secure good men and retain them.

The arrangement for promotions in the bill now pending would give the Chicago office 539 promotions during the coming year, whereas it should have at least 1,057.

The salaries paid to the superintendents in the New York post-office are $3,200, while those of Chicago are only $3,000.

The salary of the private secretary to the postmaster at New York is $2,400, and that at Chicago, which is in the same class, is $1,700.

Some idea of the volume of the business of this office may be ascertained when it is understood that on the 1st of April 2,500,-000 pieces of mail passed through the office, and that in the money-order division 64,396 transactions, amounting to $1,510,-550.69 took place on April 6.

On the preceding day 58,569 money orders were paid, amounting to $396,629.41, and 800 were issued, amounting to $11,344.50, while certificates of deposit issued numbered 768 and amounted to $435,190.

The average time of the clerks engaged in the payment of money orders received from the banks is twelve hours and thirty minutes.

Such long hours and intense application show how easily the situation of the money-order division may become critical. A great number of the men are absent on sick leave, thus throwing their work on the others, who have to work overtime each day.

Something certainly should be done to supply that division with a sufficient number of regularly trained clerks to handle this business. The work must be cleaned up every day. It can not be let to run behind.

The same condition prevails throughout the entire post-office. Three hundred and sixty-two additional men are absolutely necessary to do the work as it should be done. Some time since 130 men were allowed. This number does not meet the present needs.

Chicago will be credited with only 10 per cent of whatever number of clerks are allowed to the country, according to the rule of the Post-Office Department.

The largest mail-order houses of the world are situated at Chicago. They receive postage stamps to the amount of $3,500,-000 annually in payment for goods purchased by country customers. All the postal business of these houses is transacted in Chicago. The Chicago office does not receive credit for this volume of business, as you will readily see, because of the fact that the postage is purchased elsewhere.

If this $3,500,000 revenue from postage were added to the receipts of the Chicago office it would bring them up to $15,000,000.

If, in addition to that, Evanston, Lake Forest, Highland Park, Waukegan, Oak Park, River Forest, Morgan Park, and a number of other post-offices covering a radius of 20 miles around the city, were made substations of the Chicago post-office, the revenues would reach probably $16,500,000.

Practically all of the business from these offices is transacted at the Chicago office. It gets no credit for the work it does. The thirty-nine great trunk lines entering into Chicago and reaching into every section of the country makes the Chicago office a point of distribution greater than any other city.

It calls for more work there, and should receive more help on that account.

All of the post-offices in the outlying towns surrounding New York are substations of the central office, and all the postage purchased at these stations is credited to the New York post-office.

If this were done in Chicago, the revenues of the Chicago office would be the largest in the United States.

The number of railroads, as I said before, entering and departing from Chicago make the field of distribution much wider from that office than from any other office in the country.

Unless sufficient help is allowed to transact the business properly other sections of the country must suffer on account of the failure to make appropriations, for if the mail is not started on time it will not reach its destination as early as it should.

The growth of the office is beyond conception or description, and no one can realize it without having made a thorough investigation of it.

In recommending an increase in salary for distributers in the Chicago post-office, attention is called to the fact that their average salary is now lower, their work is harder, their hours are longer, and their night work is more plentiful than it is for other employees of the post-office.

The distributers are the backbone of the service, yet they have been overlooked to a great extent in the matter of promotion into the higher grades.

Requests are seldom if ever received in this office for transfer from other departments of the post-office to the mailing division, where the distribution of transit mails is performed. On the other hand, 60 per cent of the distributers have filed applications for transfer to the delivery, money order, or registry divisions. If it is true that a transfer from the mailing division is desirable for the clerks, why not reverse the order of things and relieve the conditions which bring about these numerous requests for transfers? Under the present system there is little inducement held out to the distributers. As a result, resignations are frequent, and there is a good deal of unrest and discontent among the men.

Failure to appreciate the expert work performed by distributers simply means failure to understand to what extent schemes of to-day are complicated. Changes in railway schedules bring about wholesale changes in schemes, as evidenced in the weekly bulletin of general orders. In addition to the labor involved in originally memorizing the location of several thousand post-offices, it frequently requires several hours of hard study to memorize scheme changes which are published in one issue of the bulletin, of which fifty-two numbers are published each year. A clerk must not only qualify on a scheme before he becomes a distributer, but he must memorize every detail of weekly scheme changes which at times amount to several hundred items, and he must also report periodically for review examinations.

It is no easy task to memorize the consecutive dispatches for twenty-four hours for every post-office located in States containing from 1,500 to 5,000 post-offices, and in addition to keep posted on numerous scheme changes.

The post-office distributer works every day in the year except on an occasional Sunday. Unlike the railway postal clerk, he has no time set apart for study. Nevertheless, he must memorize his schemes, and he does it under difficulties which few people fully understand.

There are exceptions, of course, in certain clerical positions in the post-office, but among the rank and file of the clerks the distributers are the experts of the service, yet at the present time they do not receive as high salaries on an average as other employees of the office. It has been said that the bookkeeping clerks, who receive a larger salary than the distributers, hold more responsible positions. That may be true in a few instances, but not as a general proposition. The distributer accepts a responsibility every time he throws a letter or daily paper or market report, and he throws more than 15,000 pieces of mail every night he is on duty. In these days if a distributer missends a letter or daily paper the addressee frequently makes complaint, and under the present system of checking and postmarking it is nearly always possible to locate the clerk who is responsible for making the improper dispatch. If it were not for the fact that our distributers are experts who seldom make an error, the officials of the service would be loaded down with complaints from the public.

The salaries paid to these valuable men are out of all proportion to the services rendered. Under the present system the salary is $600 per annum for beginners. This grade of pay does not and will not in these prosperous times attract a good class of men. The minimum salary should be raised to $800 per annum, and promotions, which are now slow and uncertain, should be provided in a manner that will induce trained men to remain in the service.

The records of the Chicago office show that there are 589 qualified distributers in the mailing division, and out of that number there are but 46 in the $1,200 grade, and not one of the distributers in this grade has been in the service less than fifteen years. Some of them have been in the service from twenty-five to forty years, as evidenced by the following table showing the number of distributers and length of service performed before entering into the grade named, as well as total length of service:

Grade.	Number of clerks.	Service before entry into grade.	Totallength of service.
		Years.	Years.
$1,200	46	13 to 18	15 to 42
$1,100	30	8 to 14	10 to 26
$1,000	71	4 to 13	5 to 23
$900	102	3 to 13	4 to 20
$800	199	2 to 11	2 to 15
$700	141	1 to 3	1 to 5
Total mailing division distributers.	589

In connection with the above table, please bear in mind—

First. The great majority of these men work at night.

Second. Their hours of duty have been extended anywhere from eight to twelve hours daily during the past few years, the average per day per man for the past six months being close to ten hours.

Third. Practically all of the distribution is performed under artificial light, a great deal of heavy lifting is involved, and these men can never sit down at their work. They are on their feet at the case from start to finish of tour of duty.

Fourth. In addition to long tours of duty at the office, these men must devote from one to three hours daily at home to the study and correction of schemes of distribution.

Upon arrival at the post-office for his first day's work a scheme is handed the new appointee, and he is informed that he must memorize the location to counties and routes of several thousand post-offices. For example, he must learn that Rockdale, Iowa, is in Dubuque County, and that a piece of mail addressed to Rockdale must be forwarded as follows, according to the time of receipt on the case:

Illinois Central, train 5, departing at 2.55 a. m.

Illinois Central, train 3, departing at 8.20 a. m.

Chicago and Great Western, train 9, departing at 8.45 a. m.

Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, train 5, departing at 9 a. m.

Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, train 9, departing at 1.30 p. m.

Illinois Central, train 31, departing at 3.45 p. m.

Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, train 47, departing at 6.30 p. m.

Chicago and Great Western, train 5, departing at 11 p. m.

In other words, he must memorize the county and most available route for dispatch at any hour of the day of mails addressed to any post-office located in the State or group of States to which he may be assigned. He is also informed that this scheme must be memorized at home, or at least at some time and place other than during his tour of duty in the post-office.

A great many men become discouraged at once with a prospect of from one to three hours of post-office work at home each day in addition to a regular tour of duty, which it is presumed by the uninitiated extends over an eight-hour period. However, the real discouragement comes later on when he finds, through a few days of actual experience, that tours of duty extend anywhere from nine to twelve hours and that there is no prospect of obtaining day work for years to come. He makes a few acquaintances on the floor, and after making a few brief inquiries he finds that he is working side by side with men who have been in the service from fifteen to twenty-five years and that the salaries of these veterans of the service run from $900 to $1,200 per year, comparatively few receiving the maximum salary. He finds, too, that these men are still working nights most of the time, with no prospect for permanent day work.

In the meantime he has taken another look at the complicated scheme upon which he must be examined within sixty days, and promptly hands in his resignation in order to accept a position where at least the hours are reasonable, the day work plentiful, the scheme study out of it, and the chances for advancement better than in the post-office. During the past few months the resignations have been unusually numerous, averaging about forty per month in the mailing division alone. Upon inquiry it has been ascertained that the men frequently resign to better their condition, as they see it, by accepting jobs as teamsters, street-car conductors, grocery clerks, or laborers at the stock yards. The tendency to resign is not confined entirely to the newcomers. During the past week one of the most experienced and competent men in the post-office tendered his resignation, and the only reason advanced was that he could do better elsewhere. This man has been in the service sixteen years; he has immediate supervision over a force of 700 men, and yet his salary is but $1,200 per annum. This man, as well as hundreds of others who are receiving a great deal less salary, goes home at 4 o'clock in the morning, all of them completely tired out. Many of them settle down in a corner of the "owl" car and proceed to study their schemes on the homeward trip. They arrive at home too early for a reasonable breakfast hour. They go to bed when the rest of the world is getting up, and they get out of bed in the middle of the afternoon, too late for the noon lunch hour, if the comfort of other members of the family be considered. They leave their homes at about 4 p. m. for another grind in the office. They have no evenings at home with their families. They have little or no amusement or recreation. They work nights and try to sleep days. Their life is made up principally of picking up or distributing letters and letters, throwing papers and packages and packages and papers, lifting sacks and sacks of mail, and studying schemes and schemes. The monotony of their lives is relieved only by the receipt of frequent official reprimands, demerit charges, and fines, or by an occasional appearance before the advisory board. To start with, they receive salaries of $600 per year for all of this discomfort and hardship, but if they prove to be men who would be worth $100 per month in other lines of business, they may be promoted and obtain as much as $800 or $900 per annum in from two to five years. The promotions above the latter grade are few and far between, as evidenced by the following table, showing the number of distributers promoted last year in the grades above $900:

Grade.	Number in grade.	Number of promotions in grade.
$1,000	74	4
$1,100	32	2
$1,200	46	None.

As a matter of fact, the conditions are such that the best men quietly drop out of the service and get a better position elsewhere, but a few of those who hold on may reach the $1,200 grade as distributers if they remain in the service a dozen years or more. The records of this office indicate, however, that only a comparative few reach that grade, and these few have been in the service all the way from eleven to forty-two years.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman who offered the amendment a question. Does this take out of the Department the discretion in the appointment of these clerks?

Mr. BOUTELL. Simply for that addition to the clerical force at Chicago of 100 for the balance of the fiscal year.

Mr. MURDOCK. To that extent it takes it out of the discretion of the Department?

Mr. BOUTELL. It does.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I would like to get some information from the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. About the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. About the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the question is taken on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana how many clerks there are altogether in all of the post-offices in the United States?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you mean all the post-offices of the first and second class?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Well, take them.

Mr. OVERSTREET. First and second class clerks. On the 19th day of March, 1906, there were employed in the United States, in first and second class post-offices, including clerks in charge of stations, 26,988.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Can the gentleman state how many are receiving a thousand dollars per annum?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did not hear the question. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is on the committee, and who heard the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. There were 2,726 receiving $1,000 compensation on January 10 last.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman please give me and give the House the number receiving $900 per annum, $800 per annum, $700 per annum, and $600 per annum in detail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, the gentleman does not mean detail by offices?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. No, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. On the 10th day of March, 1906, there were employed in offices of the first and second class, at the grade of $600, 4,089; at the grade of $700, 3,600; at the grade of $800, 4,118; at the grade of $900, 2,679.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether or not he thinks that these clerks are receiving adequate compensation for the services they render the Government?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, Mr. Chairman, that involves the whole problem of the general increase of salaries of clerks of these grades. I am inclined to think some of them are not; I am not prepared to say that all of them are not.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not a fact that the salaries of these clerks are not increased because the revenues from the Post-Office Department now show an annual deficit?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not answer that in a word. The condition of the revenues with respect to the postal service has something to do with the lack of consideration of general increases of salaries. The financial condition of the Department, showing as it does under existing conditions a deficit of approximately fourteen and one-half million dollars, necessarily causes caution on the part of the committee in recommending general increases.

If there were a surplus, and if the general increases of the service, by reason of new facilities, were properly cared for, I am inclined to think that there would be a disposition to increase the salaries of a number of the clerks. But permit me to go a step further and say this, that the urgency upon the part of Members for increases of salaries of clerks is paralleled by the urgency of other Members for an increase of salaries of carriers, both city and rural, and by still others for increase of salaries of mail clerks. So that the committee, considering the whole field, must take into account the payment for those various grades of employees. Therefore it would be necessary to have a fuller understanding of the financial condition of the Department with respect to all these grades before answering specifically with respect to only one.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Does the gentleman believe that clerks and employees in the Post-Office Department should be paid salaries equal to what they can earn in private employment?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If not, I think they usually resign and take private employment.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Is it not true, Mr. Chairman, that in that way many of the post-offices throughout the country are losing some of their most efficient clerks?

[The time of Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. In answer to the gentleman I will say, Mr. Chairman, that there have been various reports to the effect that some post-office employees resign to take more lucrative positions in private life. I take it that in some instances there are resignations from employments in private life to accept employment under the Federal Government. Just what proportion is the larger of the two classes I am unable to say.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Does the chairman of the committee believe that the clerks should be classified as the carriers are classified?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think, as a matter of practice, that it would be better administration if there should be a classification of clerks; whether just as the carriers are classified I am not prepared to say.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. But the principle of classification in its application tends to the efficiency of the service, does it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think that is quite true.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. And if the Post-Office Department showed a surplus instead of a deficit, would the gentleman from Indiana be in favor of classifying the clerks and promoting them from year to year for efficient service?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should prefer to cross that bridge when we reach it. I am not quite prepared this moment to enter into any statement of opinion that might be binding upon me after full investigation. Naturally, it is easier to provide for promotions with a surplus than it is when you are wrestling with a deficit.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add just a few words. My observation and experience is that the postal clerks are underpaid; that they are paid less than clerks rendering similar services in other lines. I believe, and I think the gentlemen of this House believe, that an increase is denied to these clerks because the Department does not yield sufficient revenue to pay such increase. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, here and now, that this Government is better able, the people at large are better able, to pay out of the general revenues of the Government adequate salaries to these clerks than the clerks are to render services to the Government for inadequate compensation.

And I say also, Mr. Chairman, that when an opportunity arises in this House I shall favor a bill which will place these clerks in the classified service, so that when one of them gets into a post-office at a low salary he may know that efficient service will bring its own recompense.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $22,600,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 11, page 11, the word "six" and insert the word "seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 11, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "seven."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 11, after the word "dollars," add: "Provided, That such appropriation shall be available only when it shall have been provided that the leave of absence of clerks who have been thirty or more years in the service and have reached the age of 60 years may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be extended for such length of time as he may, in each instance, deem advisable, the service to be performed by a substitute, who shall be paid not more than $600 per annum, and all sums paid substitutes shall be deducted from the salaries, respectively, of the clerks given such leave."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is contrary to existing law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a limitation. It provides that in cities of over 250,000 inhabitants the appropriation for clerks is nugatory unless prior to the time when it becomes available such regulations have been adopted in pursuance of the statute, and I want to call the attention of the Chairman to the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the Fifty-eighth Congress, on the 22d of March, Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair. But I ought to say in all fairness to the Chair that a day or two after the matter again came up, and Mr. CRUMPACKER, not then in the chair, stated that his former ruling was erroneous. The Chairman [Mr. BOUTELL] considered the question a very close one, and only decided it because the gentleman from California, Mr. Livernash, conceded that it was a change of existing law. That concession I do not make. While the salary is fixed by law, there is no obligation on Congress to appropriate a dollar for the payment of any salary, and we would have a perfect right to wipe out every salary in every city over 250,000.

The adoption of this amendment, if no other legislation is adopted, would bring about that result, and therefore it is a limitation, and not a change of existing law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, under the statute passed October 1, 1890, chapter 1260 of the Revised Statutes, page 878, provision was made for leaves of absence to clerks employed in the first and second class offices. That statute directs the way, manner, and conditions under which these leaves of absence may be granted. This amendment changes that law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not change that law. The clerks in these offices who continue to be employed will still have their leaves of absence and none others, but if this amendment is adopted not a dollar of this appropriation will be available for a clerk or clerk hire in cities over 250,000. It does not change the leaves of absence law at all; it simply nullifies so much appropriation. It is the same as if Congress should have said that in cities over 250,000 there shall be no appropriation for clerk hire during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1906, and the gentleman would not question for a minute that we would have the right to say that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is because it does say something that is contrary to the statute which makes it subject to a point of order. I think it is so plain that there is no need of discussing it further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly clear on the subject. Rulings upon the subject of limitation have not been consistent by any manner of means; they have gone through something of an evolution. The later decisions have tended toward the point indicated, that where the proposed limitation might be construed by the executive or administrative officer as a modification of statute, a change of existing law, it could not be held to be a limitation. The Chair's belief is that the rulings along that line are correct, and so the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 11, strike out "$22,600,000" and insert "$23,732,000."

"And the Postmaster-General is hereby instructed to increase by $100 each the clerks in the several classes from $600 to $1,300, as follows: All of the $600 and $700 clerks, 50 per cent of the $800 clerks, 25 per cent of the $900 clerks, 20 per cent of the $1,000 clerks, 15 per cent of the $1,100 clerks, 10 per cent of the $1,200 clerks, and 5 per cent of the $1,300 clerks."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that every Member of the House understands the situation as well as I do. It seems so meritorious, and it is so well known that the clerks are underpaid, that under the discussion that has already taken place I did not think the chairman of the committee would interpose this point of order. I should think it is so meritorious a matter it would be passed without objection, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw any objection to it and let it pass.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the salaries of these clerks now in the service, fixed in the last appropriation bill, would be changed by an increase of appropriation amounting to $1,132,000, distributed as the gentleman's amendment provides. It does not provide in any way for additional clerks, but is limited entirely to the increase of salaries to clerks already in the service. I think it is clearly subject to the point of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to hear what the Chair says on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 14, after the word "sum," insert: "Hereafter clerks and employees attached to post-offices of the first and second class shall be allowed leaves of absence with full pay for not exceeding fifteen days in any one fiscal year; and where some member of the immediate family of any such clerk or employee shall be deceased or afflicted with a contagious disease and requires his or her care and attendance, or where the presence in the post-office of such clerk or employee would jeopardize the health of fellow clerks or employees, and in exceptional and meritorious cases, where any such clerk or employee shall be personally ill, it may, within the discretion of the postmaster, be extended with pay for not exceeding ten days in such fiscal year: Provided, That during such absence of any such clerk or employee his or her duties shall be performed by his or her fellow clerks or employees, and without the temporary employment of other persons or other expense whatsoever to the Post-Office Department: And provided further, That no such clerk or employee shall be granted leave of absence until he or she has performed service for one year."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order or the merits of the amendment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I admit that the amendment is probably subject to the point of order. I only wish to say that the amendment seeks to do justice to a class of clerks who perform service of great value to the public, and which is inadequately rewarded. This amendment enables these employees to protect themselves and their families, and does not require any additional expense from the Government. The effect of the amendment is only this: Under the law, as just read by the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, clerks of the first and second classes are entitled to leave of absence not exceeding fifteen days, as may be arranged by the postmasters by properly distributing the force of their offices without incurring expense and without hiring substitutes. This amendment allows an extension of ten days, in the discretion of the postmaster, in the three following classes: First, where a member of the family of the clerk shall be deceased or shall be seriously ill and needs the personal care and attendance of the clerk; second, where the clerk or some member of his immediate family may have a contagious disease which would jeopardize the health of his fellow-clerks, which fact shall be properly proven to the post-office authorities; and, third, where he himself may be ill so seriously as not to be able to work, which shall also be properly guarded by the postmaster. In these three classes of cases relief should be extended to deserving clerks provided no expense shall be incurred by the Government therefor. We all know that the work of the offices is arranged, and can be so arranged, that the fellow-clerks can do the work for vacations, as now allowed by law, or as may be provided by this amendment. I think the experience of all who are familiar with the work of this class of clerks is that they work considerably more than eight hours per day.

The figures just produced from the Chicago post-office are similar to those in nearly every first and second class office in the country, and certainly in the offices with which I am familiar, are that these clerks work, and work very hard and faithfully, from nine to ten hours each per day. They do this extra work very often in order that there shall be no extra expense to the office when their fellow-clerks receive leave of absence. It very often happens after a clerk has received his fifteen days annual leave that a death or sickness or a contagious disease may occur in his own immediate family, then he is obliged to lay off without any compensation at all. We realize the salaries paid these men are now inadequate even with the increases provided by this bill. Now, in addition, when trouble and care and additional expense come, the Government harshly takes away even the little that they have. In the Departments here in Washington thirty days annual leave of absence are allowed by law to the clerks and thirty days additional may be annually allowed in meritorious cases, in just such cases as are provided by this amendment. Our clerks in the first and second class offices do not get as much pay, must work nearly one-fourth more time per day, work harder, with only one-half as much annual leave for vacation, and no leeway at all for sickness. Congress is guilty of gross favoritism in these cases against a most deserving class of employees.

In a case such as I have mentioned, there is not a corporation in the United States but what would give a similar leave of absence with full pay to a deserving clerk. This great Government alone seems to be mean and niggardly enough to take the pound of flesh. I am aware this amendment may be subject to the point of order, but it is an opportunity where justice can be done without expense, and I hope very much the Chairman can see his way clear not to insist upon the strict application of the rules. The clerks who do the extra work will see there is no shirking or abuse by their fellow-clerks, and it will give them great courage for their arduous work and confidence that they are cared for as fairly and justly as possible. I trust the point of order will not be pressed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order under the statute which I cited a while ago to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I wish to call the Chair's attention to another statute which I think comes still more closely to that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota admits the amendment is subject to the point of order. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to substitutes for clerks at first and second class post-offices on vacation, $100,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the report adequately states the facts in relation to this.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It depends upon what report the gentleman refers to.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The report of the committee reporting the bill. I understand from the report that this bill increases the salaries to the sum of $500,000. That is one lump sum. Is that correct?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In the salaries of the clerks of the first and second class offices.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Increasing the salaries of the personnel of the Post-Office.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Of that class.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Five hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire where we can find those increases in the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. At the grade from $600 to $1,100.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. On what pages?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Beginning with page 9, in line 14, and continuing to line 22, page 10. They have all been passed. In this paragraph provision is made by the number provided for for these grades for the promotion of this class.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the bill then carries $500,000 increase in salary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Of these clerks.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; and then in addition to that I make $3,750 increase in post-office inspectors' salaries?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is to equalize the salaries of fifteen post-office inspectors in charge.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is an increase, in fact?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is right.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I would like to inquire further how many offices are created in this bill in addition to the existing personnel which become a charge upon the Treasury?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are no new offices created, but there is an additional force provided for in the various grades necessitated by the increased volume of business.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. How much does that aggregate?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The total increase in dollars, as the gentleman has mentioned it as a charge upon the Treasury, incident entirely to the additional employment of post-office clerks, amounts to $1,600,000. The additional increase in the appropriation due to the increase in the number of letter carriers in the cities, occasioned by estimated increase of volume of business, is $931,425. The increase of appropriation incident to the estimated increase of railway mail clerks, occasioned by estimated increase in the volume of business, is $822,000, while the increase in the rural free-delivery service is $3,080,000, making a grand total of $6,433,425, occasioned entirely by the estimated increase in the volume of postal service.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the figures indicating an increased charge on account of the personnel of the postal service as $6,433,425 are relatively the same items that appear in the bill for 1906, which aggregated $2,770,000? Are these the same general items?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman must be in error about being $2,600,000, because the last appropriation bill, for the current fiscal year, carried over $2,000,000 for extension of the rural free-delivery service alone.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I have taken the item, $2,770,000, from the analysis made by the clerks, showing the additional offices created and the charge made upon the Treasury.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is for the year 1906?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. What I want to know is whether this is a similar item or if it probably includes other items?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is evidently some mistake, because I know it would be more than that, because in each one of these several classes of employees—the clerks in the first and second class offices, the railway mail clerks, and the city letter carriers and the rural delivery carriers—there is also an increase in the current fiscal year, and I am quite sure that the total incease would be much more than $2,000,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. These items are not parallel with the analysis which was given me by the Clerk?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They can not be parallel. I do not know just where the error is.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to make this further inquiry of the chairman of the committee: The increase in the salaries in this bill is $503,750, against the total increase for salaries of all the Departments for last year of $41,475; that is to say, in your post-office appropriation bill you have increased the salaries ten times as much as the net increase of salaries during last year, for 1906—I see my friend shakes his head—but this is the analysis given me by the Clerk.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not shaking my head.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from New Jersey is shaking his.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not know what the facts may be relative to the increase in salaries in other Departments of the Government. The increase of half a million dollars for clerks in the first and second class post-offices is limited to the low grade of clerks, and is provided for the purpose of avoiding resignations of efficient clerks, who are encouraged by men in civil life to leave the Government service for more lucrative positions. I think that the increase in the salaries of these low-grade clerks to the extent of $500,000 is fairly justified upon that ground. Eliminating that $500,000, then the total increase of salaries to clerks now in the postal service is a little over $3,000, according to the gentleman's own figures.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I would like to inquire how it happens that in this particular it becomes necessary to make that enormous increase?

Mr. OVERSTREET. My friend forgets that similar provisions have been carried in other bills every year. There was in former bills an annual provision of $1,000,000 for this very purpose, and the committee in recent years has been recommending a far less sum. If no provision were made, Mr. Chairman, for the increase of the salaries of the low-grade clerks in the post-offices of the first and second class, there would unquestionably follow a wholesale resignation of efficient clerks, greatly to the impairment of the service.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is an inquiry I want to make: Is there found any difficulty up to date in getting the service of clerks of that grade because of the rate of salary?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, you might get clerks for even less salaries than provided by law, but there is found great difficulty in holding efficient clerks in these low grades, carrying, as they do, such small salaries.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can the gentleman advise the committee how many clerks have left the service of the Government on account of the inadequate salaries?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not, definitely, but I can say that in the large offices in such cities as the first ten cities in the country, beginning with New York, that there is constantly a complaint, not only by the Department through postmasters, but upon the floor of the House by Representatives from these cities, that the salaries provided for these low-grade clerks is not sufficient to encourage them to remain in the service.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to inquire if the hearing before the Post-Office Committee disclosed any details upon that point.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No details; it is not a new matter to the committee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Except in a general way, that complaint is made. Now, I suppose a little later we will have another bureau coming in and wanting their salaries raised in order to make them proportionate to these salaries.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman forgets that when you start a clerk in a post-office in New York, St. Louis, or Chicago, or any of the larger cities of the Union, at the grade of $600, expecting that clerk by reason of application to duty and the enlargement of his experience to ripen into a clerk of sufficient capacity to become a distributer, necessitating intelligence beyond the ordinary intelligence of the average clerk, you must, if you expect to hold him, make some provision by way of incentive to remain in the service, by holding out the encouragement of an additional compensation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This $100 extra, for instance?

Mr. OVERSTREET. This $100 extra.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That applies to all clerks coming in hereafter in that same grade?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It does not unless provision shall be made for it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is this simply a promotion of clerks, or is it an actual increase of salaries?

Mr. OVERSTREET. A promotion. As the gentleman will find in reading the report to which he has referred, 50 per cent of the $600 clerks in the service, and 40 per cent of those in the grade of $700, 20 per cent in the $800 grade, and 5 per cent in the nine, ten, and eleven hundred dollar grades, get this promotion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is $600 the lowest?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the lowest grade of clerks in first-class offices, excepting that when they first enter the service on what is termed a probationary period, they enter at $500. And there are clerks in charge of stations, and clerks of that kind, who receive less than $600.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But the lowest grade of regular clerks is now $600?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The lowest grade in second-class offices is $500 and the lowest grade in first-class offices is $600.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You do not increase the salary of any $500 clerk, then?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, yes; by reason of the promotion of the $600 clerks, leaving vacancies in that class, which would permit of the promotion of some $500 clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to get some information, and I ask unanimous consent to extend the time for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I want to put this question: What is the grade of a $600 clerk?

Mr. OVERSTREET. He is in what is called the $600 grade.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The lowest grade?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the lowest grade in first-class offices.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. From now on does he get $700?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If he is promoted he does.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did not understand the last question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The lowest grade of clerks in a second-class post-office gets $500 now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is correct.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And the lowest grade in a first-class post-office gets $600?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. From now on does this lowest grade clerk in a first-class office get $700?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is no change, then, in the salary of that grade?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then this is simply a promotion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Absolutely a promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks who receive $600 and 40 per cent of the clerks who receive $700, and so on, according to the statement in the report.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the committee to understand, then, as a matter of fact, there really is not any increase of salary; that all this means is that a second-grade clerk gets up to the next grade, and so on?

Mr. OVERSTREET. A certain per cent of the clerks.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A certain per cent?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And that you continue the grades at the same rate of salary?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And that sort of an appropriation has been carried in your bill right along, all the while, year after year?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; in former years to the extent of a million dollars a year.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Last year that item was approximately $375,000 in this bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As I understand the gentleman now, I must frankly submit that the reading of the report clearly gave the erroneous impression I have had, and I will read it so that the gentleman may see:

In fixing the appropriation for pay of post-office clerks provision is made for an arbitrary increase of salary of $100 each of 5,000 clerks of the lower grades, in order to stimulate interest in the service and to avoid resignations of efficient clerks who become discouraged by insufficient pay.

Now, I supposed that that meant what it says.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It increases the pay of 5,000 individual men.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but it does not increase the salaries of these grades, but they go up a grade; they are promoted, but in any proper sense it does not increase the salary at all. The grades in which they are now serving receive the same salary after this bill passes that they receive now, but when they step up a grade and render more efficient service they get the salary attached to that grade.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So that in any proper sense it is not an increase of salary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not an increase of salary. They get an increased compensation because they pass to another grade.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With that explanation I have no criticism to make.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For unusual conditions at third and fourth class post-offices, $75,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, strike out lines 3 and 4 and insert "for unusual conditions, second, third, and fourth class post-offices, $100,000."

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting at the end of the amendment the following: "And for extraordinary conditions, $150,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order is that it is new legislation. There is no provision whatever in the appropriation bills of prior years for extraordinary conditions at any post-office.

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no provision in existing law for unusual conditions, and therefore the amendment to the amendment is in order if the amendment itself is in order.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask my colleague what sort of conditions he is providing for?

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman will withhold the point of order——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve it.

Mr. OLMSTED. The paragraph which is now under consideration appropriates for unusual conditions in certain offices. My amendment provides for extraordinary conditions. I do not know exactly what is meant by unusual conditions in a post-office. The term "unusual" signifies something uncommon—something not usual. Now, extraordinary conditions means more than uncommon. It signifies something rare. If only one-quarter of the clerks in an office should attend the baseball game, that would be unusual. But if none of them went, that would be extraordinary. [Laughter.] But seriously, Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment was that I might ask the gentleman for some information.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. But is the gentleman from Pennsylvania trifling with us? I asked him, if he is going to insist on his amendment, if the adjective "rare" refers to the clerk or the post-office?

Mr. OLMSTED. To the condition.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire, Mr. Chairman, if there is any authority in the second-class offices——

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I shall probably withdraw the amendment to the amendment when I have had an explanation from the chairman of the Post-Office Committee of the original proposition. What I really desire is to know what unusual conditions can exist to justify any such appropriation at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment, which I think will satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that frequently there occurs, particularly in the mining camps of the West, and occasionally in Alaska, such an increase in the number of people who assemble there to prosecute the mining investigations that the office suddenly rises from one class to another, and on these occasions of extraordinary prosperity it is quite difficult for the Department to determine whether these conditions are permanent or not. They may appear for a few weeks, or months, or a few years, and may appear to be a permanent condition; but while post-offices increased in volume under stimulus of that kind, the mines may give way and become exhausted and the conditions removed, and hence it has been found difficult to make ample provision by way of appointing clerks to meet the increased volume of business at these offices. This situation has appeared at Tonopah and Goldfield, in Nevada, where cities have grown to many thousands, and the volume of postal business has rapidly increased. The increased volume of the postal business was such that it was utterly impossible for the limited number of clerks to care for it. This necessitated the patrons of the offices standing in line for hours at a time in order to get their mail.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In a moment. But, Mr. Chairman, the committee felt that $75,000 was sufficient, and that at the time was thought to be sufficient under the recommendation for the Department, except for one additional condition which developed, notably in these Nevada camps. That is by reason of the opportunity for better compensation in business outside of the offices it has been impossible to employ clerks at the low grade of salaries authorized by law, even for a short period of time, and that is regarded as an unusual condition, and under that provision the Department would have authority to employ additional clerks and temporarily to pay the higher price for those employed.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know I fully caught the gentleman's statement, but did the committee not have before it the Tonopah and Goldfield proposition when they estimated the $75,000 item?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was going to explain that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a second? Does he gentleman's explanation as to the difficulty of obtaining clerks explain the change in language?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir; and the reason, I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina, for the increase was on account of the fact that after the bill was prepared and the committee had adjourned statements were brought to my attention as chairman, both officially and unofficially, that in one or two cases of these mining camps the office had really risen to the second class, not only the third and fourth, so the item was increased $25,000 more. I do not think they will need the $150,000 called for by the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Do I understand the object of this appropriation is to cover cases where temporarily the provisions of the office might be such as to entitle them to a higher grade and a larger appropriation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not necessarily that, because offices in Indiana or Pennsylvania, by reason of the natural growth of business and population, might in a few months ripen into the next higher grade, but could not under the law be designated as such until a fixed date. This is to meet an unusual condition at offices like mining camps and in the great West where, by reason of sudden influx of population, the office has suddenly increased in business.

Mr. OLMSTED. But not permanently?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, these conditions are extraordinary, and I therefore withdraw my amendment, so that the gentleman's amendment may come before the House without embarrassment to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask one or two questions of the chairman of the committee. Has this provision been in similar language in a similar bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not in exactly the same language. Now, under the current law it has the following language: "For unusual business, third and fourth class post-offices, etc., and provided under the direction of the order of the Postmaster-General any part of this sum may be allowed for clerk hire, rent, fuel, and miscellaneous expenses in Alaska when, by reason of unusual conditions, the interest of the service demands such allowances." The change is made for the reason that unusual business in one part of the country and unusual conditions in Alaska was not quite a satisfactory arrangement of language.

Mr. POWERS. Do you not in your estimate of salaries for postmasters take into consideration the probable increase of the business during the present year?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, certainly. For compensation for postmasters generally that is the basis of the estimate. But this item is simply for emergency purposes.

Mr. POWERS. It is just a contingent fund.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Practically it might be so called.

Mr. POWERS. Now, is there anything in this paragraph that would prevent it from being entirely used for the purchase of furniture or any other thing they sought to use it for at these fourth-class offices?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think none of it could be used for that under the regulations of the Department, the provision for supplies being definitely fixed in another part of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Why would it not have been—I only ask for information—quite as well to have given some intimation in the paragraph that it was intended for extraordinary services in Alaska?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, unusual conditions must necessarily mean something out of the ordinary; otherwise it would not be unusual.

Mr. POWERS. Well, unusual conditions in third and fourth class post-offices. Have you any statement as to where and what these conditions are? I listened to the gentleman's explanation to get some information, and I understand it was where mining camps spring up suddenly or something of that kind.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I mention that, because that has been the practice of the Department on that item.

Mr. POWERS. But I see nothing in the item that indicates it was anything more or less than a contingent fund to put persons in these offices to use as they please.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is placed entirely under the authority of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. POWERS. It seems to me this is a rather loose statement, although I do not wish to be understood as censuring the great Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post-offices, $3,000,000: Provided, That there shall not be allowed for the use of any third-class post-office for rent a sum in excess of $400, nor more than $80 for fuel and light in any one year: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the purpose of leasing premises for the use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly, for a term not exceeding ten years.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against so much of that paragraph as follows the word "year," in line 22, page 12, as new legislation.

Mr. Chairman, not out of any desire to antagonize the committee, but in order that I may have some light upon this question, I reserve the point of order. I should like to hear the chairman of the committee on it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this provision is in the identical language in which it has been carried for a good while, so as to permit advantageous contracts on the part of the Government where long-time leases can be obtained. The reason is that it is a benefit to the Government to make an advantageous contract for a term of years rather than a higher rate of contract from year to year.

Mr. FINLEY. The Government suffers no injury by this, because the Department can give up a lease whenever it gets ready.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; I am obliged to the gentleman. The Government suffers no injury, because in all these contracts a provision is carried giving the option to the Government to terminate the lease upon one year's notice.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is just what I wanted to find out. For instance, the Government might rent quarters in a rapidly growing town, and at the expiration of two or three years the quarters it had might prove absolutely inadequate. The question was, Would the Government be compelled to pay the rent for ten years, although it might have to go out and get a larger office? On the explanation of the gentleman I cheerfully withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental or purchase of canceling machines, including cost of power, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $250,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move, in line 9, page 13, after the word "power," to add the words "in rented buildings."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, in line 9, after the word "power," insert the words "in rented buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for lease of canceling machines unless the lease shall contain a clause giving the Government the option to purchase said machines.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, in Document 383, second session Fifty-eighth Congress, there is a very interesting story about the canceling machines rented and purchased by the Government. The First Assistant Postmaster-General testified before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that the Department had endeavored in making rental contracts with the owners of these machines to incorporate in the contracts a clause giving the Government the right to purchase. He further stated that all of the companies had refused to incorporate this clause in their contract. There are two parties who can play the holp-up game. Some of these canceling machines are rented to the Government for as much as $400 a year. This document which I hold in my hand shows that canceling machines were rented in some instances for more than twice what it costs to construct them. There are about eight companies making canceling machines.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If your amendment does not prescribe any method by which the amount of the purchase price of a canceling machine shall be fixed, what real benefit would it be to the Government to have that kind of a stipulation in the contract, because the owner of the machine could fix the price at such a figure that the Government could not purchase it? It seems to me that in order to make your amendment effective it ought to contain some provision by which the price of the canceling machine should be arrived at.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a very happy suggestion, and I shall be glad to accept any amendment which will effect what I am trying to accomplish. Of course the machines are of different prices, and the rentals are different. The purchasing price would be different; but I assume that under this provision, if it were adopted, the Post-Office Department would not insert a clause in the lease to purchase, except at a figure they were willing to pay, if they decided to purchase.

Mr. NORRIS. Just from hearing your amendment read, as I understood it, the Post-Office Department would not have that authority. The man who owns the machines could put in any figure he saw fit, which would nullify what you are trying to reach.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I have already stated, if the amendment as drafted is not sufficient to accomplish the purpose, let us so draft it that it will accomplish that purpose. These companies making the canceling machines are renting them to the Government at exorbitant prices. They refuse to sell because the Government pays them an annual rental that in most cases, I dare say, would be a handsome price for them if they were selling the machines outright.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the House will give me five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is a business proposition. It seems to me that if we provide in the law that these gentlemen can not rent their machines to the Government unless they are willing to meet the Government on a fair, equitable, conscientious basis, that we will accomplish our purpose. The Government is not obliged to rent any one of these machines. If these people are made to understand that the Government will no longer be held up by them, they will come to terms, because there can be no other purchaser and no other renter in the United States. I hope that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will consent to incorporate this amendment into their bill, and trust before the next session of Congress we will have from that committee information as to the cost of these machines, and then we can legislate more wisely and understandingly on the question.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Does the gentleman know whether or not any of these canceling machines are for sale at any price, or do the manufacturers lease them and refuse to sell?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Government has purchased in years past a large number of machines, as shown in this document, but the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in testifying before this committee that was making up this particular bill, stated that he was unable now to purchase or to get the companies to insert an option to purchase in the leases. I want to fix it so that if they are not willing to deal with us fairly they can not deal with us at all.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Then, as a matter of fact, the manufacturers are holding the Government up and getting almost the entire price out of each machine each year?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is by no means a new subject. The proposition has been made before in former Congresses, and it is not wise to make such a provision a part of the bill. These machines are needed by the Gevornment more than they are needed by the owners. This facility, particularly in the great offices of the country, saves thousands of dollars, because many additional clerks would be necessary to use hand machines to cancel the stamps. If we insert such a provision in the bill the owners of these machines would simply refuse to accept it. The gentleman's amendment would necessarily be followed by increased appropriations for the employment of additional clerks to stamp upon the separate envelopes the cancellation now made by the machines. It is a saving to the Government notwithstanding the heavy rental price. There are many facilities of which the Government avails itself in the postal service which are of great expense to the Government, but these very facilities save additional expense which would be increased many times over if the facilities were not used. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is true that the Government is at the mercy of the manufacturers of the stamp-canceling machines?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is this about it. I wanted to state but I forgot to, that on one occasion such a provision was carried and the parties declined to accept the contract and took the machines out, and that necessitated the employment of clerks to do the work, and the expense of the clerks was very much greater than the rental of the machines.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I agree with the gentleman on that proposiiton, but are these machines so covered by patents, so manufactured that the Government can not purchase them in any market at any price?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Except the parties would agree, and they decline to agree to sell.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. In other words, the manufacturers of these machines insist upon leasing only and refuse to sell?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true, and on one occasion actually withdrew them from the Government use.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. Does not the patent law provide an obligation upon the patentee to furnish the machines patented at a reasonable cost?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not familiar with the patent law, and I do not know.

Mr. PADGETT. My impression is, without examining it, that it does, and the Government could avail itself of the stipulation if they sought to resort to that method to defeat this legislation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 58. So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers and substitute letter carriers at offices already established, and for pay of substitute and temporary letter carriers for holiday, election, emergency, and summer and winter resort service, city delivery service, $22,228,000.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 1 and 2, on page 14, strike out "$22,228,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$24,755,800," and add: "That after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of more than 100,000 population for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service shall be $800; for the third year of service shall be $1,000; for the fourth year of service and thereafter shall be $1,200; and after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of a population of under 100,000 for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service, $800; for the third year of service and thereafter, $1,000."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is contrary to existing law.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I trust the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana insists on his point of order.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a brief period?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], and I trust the chairman of the Post-Office Committee will permit it to come before the House proper, where it may be decided upon its merits. In common justice and in the interests of fair play I trust that this will be done.

The bill under consideration shows great care in its construction and recommendations. I desire to specially commend to the country the fact that this great Department of the Government, the one that comes the nearest to the people, came within $14,572,584.13 of a total expenditure of $181,022,093.75 of paying for itself.

The provision for the extension of the pneumatic tubes in several of the larger cities, particularly in New York, is a wise recommendation, and one that should be adopted.

In the city of New York 4 miles of this tube is in operation. This provision in the pending bill (should it become law), will enable the Government to build additional lines that are absolutely necessary to the proper handling of the mails. It has the indorsement of Postmaster Willcox, of New York City, an able and efficient officer, as well as the Postmaster-General.

The one criticism that I have to make on the bill is of omission and not of commission, and is to my mind a serious mistake, working a gross injustice to a most deserving class of public servants. I allude to the pay of the letter carriers, for which the bill carries $22,228,000.

It is generally acknowledged that the cost of living in the larger cities has increased fully 25 per cent in the last five years, yet not a cent of increase of salary. That something should be done no one will deny. Feeling a deep interest in the matter, I addressed a letter to the Postmaster-General under date of March 31, asking how much additional would be required to advance the salaries of these hard-working men in cities of 100,000 population and over. His letter explains itself. I ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1906.

Hon. A. J. GOULDEN,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 31st ultimo, in which you asked to be informed what additional appropriation would be required to raise the salaries of letter carriers in all cities having a population of 100,000 or over to $1,200 a year, I have to advise you that at the beginning of the next fiscal year there will be 10,139 carriers, in thirty-nine cities, who would be entitled to the maximum salary of $1,200 a year, and that an additional appropriation of $2,027,800 would be necessary to cover the increased compensation of these men.

The figures given are based on the assumption that you have in mind the promotion from $1,000 to $1,200 of all carriers employed in the cities in question who have been in the service for three years or more; that is, that you propose to create in such cities a fourth class of carriers, at $1,200 a year, to be composed of the men who have already served at least one year in the present $1,000 class.

Respectfully,
GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. GOULDEN. The letter of the Postmaster-General shows that it would require but $2,027,800 to pay the salaries of the carriers in thirty-nine of the larger cities, where the living expenses have materially increased during the last five years. These hard-working, faithful men, who work in rain and shine, in storm and fair weather, and whose hours generally cover from twelve to fifteen out of the twenty-four, though their actual hours are but eight, are entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress.

The police and firemen in every large city are paid from twelve to fourteen hundred dollars yearly, with a pension in many places, when incapacitated on account of age or infirmity, of one-half of the salary.

This is especially true in the city of New York, where the higher salary is paid, while the letter carrier receives as a maximum but $1,000 per year and no pension when forced to leave the service, unfitted for labor of any kind.

It seems reasonable to expect the United States Government to treat its faithful servants as well as the great Democratic city of New York, and I earnestly hope that the pending amendment may be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to direct the attention of the Chair to the act of 1887, fixing the salaries of letter carriers. The amendment is clearly in violation of that law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman insists on his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in lines 1 and 2, page 14, "$22,228,000" and substitute the following: "$24,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for said purpose unless in the use thereof the carriers hereinafter mentioned shall be paid salaries as follows, to wit: That after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of more than 75,000 population, for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service shall be $800; for the third year of service shall be $1,000; for the fourth year of service and thereafter shall be $1,200. And after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of population under 75,000 for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service, $800; for the third year of service and thereafter, $1,000, and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman from New York desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. SULZER. Of course the gentleman from Indiana knows that he can not make a point of order against this proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman has done so. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will discuss the point of order. In doing so let me say, incidentally, that I substantially agree with all that my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] has said regarding the efficient and arduous and reliable services performed by these deserving employees of the Government, the letter carriers, and the inadequacy of the wages they receive for their work.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SULZER. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that he will get along just as well and just as fast with his bill if he will take things easy.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I merely want to say, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I merely want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to his remarks of a year or two ago, when he made the same speech.

Mr. SULZER. I have not made the speech yet, but I shall make it every year [laughter], and I will keep on making it as long as I am in Congress, until justice is done to the letter carriers. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I wanted to know if the gentleman was going to add to that same speech, which he has heretofore delivered, the abuse of myself and the prediction that the letter carriers would see to my retirement, and if he is then going to strike that part of his speech from the RECORD, as he did before?

Mr. SULZER. I will if you ask me to again.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I never have asked it.

Mr. SULZER. Very well, then I will let it stay in the RECORD. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I will permit the gentleman to proceed to make his same old speech.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. I do not want the gentleman to make a speech in my time. Let him make his speech in his own time. The gentleman has all the time he wants, and it is very hard for us Democrats over here to get any time at all. Now, I do not intend to indulge in any reflections on the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is unnecessary. But I do want him distinctly to understand that if I wanted to state all the facts regarding the outrageous way in which the poor letter carriers are treated and the gentleman's responsibility for it, not only would the gentleman be retired from Congress by his constituents, but every Member of this House who sits here year in and year out and is afraid to show his colors on this question would be retired, too. I hope the friends of the letter carriers in every Congressional district in the country in the coming Congressional campaign will demand a pledge from the candidates to favor this bill, and vote for the candidate that will promise to work for and support this bill in the next Congresss, and vote against the candidate who will not pledge himself to do all in his power to make the bill a law. We will never succeed unless something like this is done.

There is not a man in this House who does not know that I am telling the truth when I say that these letter carriers are the hardest worked, the most patient, the most honest, the most zealous, the most untiring, and the most efficient men to-day in the employ of the Government; and yet they get the poorest pay. They are paid to-day just about the same wages they were paid twenty-five years ago, and everybody knows that the price of the necessaries of life under the Dingley tariff law has gone up over 30 per cent during the last ten years, and the letter carriers' wages remain just the same as they were twenty-five years ago. [Applause.]

The letter carriers and the post-office clerks, and every other person whose salary is fixed, do not get any benefit from the Dingley high-tariff law, for nearly all the necessaries of life they have to buy now they have to pay about 30 per cent more by reason of this Republican tariff law than they did ten years ago.

The letter carriers ask for a very little more salary, and to have it a graduated salary as provided for in my bill, now offered as an amendment. After a man has worked faithfully several years, give him an increase; after he has served five years, another increase, and so on until the carriers in the large cities of this country—and there are only thirty-nine of them, I believe, with a population of over 75,000—would get $1,200 a year.

Now, I say $1,200 a year for a letter carrier who has worked for the Government for years honestly and faithfully, in all kinds of weather, carrying the mail in sunshine and rain, in storm and distress, in the cold of winter and the heat of summer, is little enough. No man can bring up his family and educate his children on any less. I know there are letter carriers in the city of New York who do not dare get married because they know that they can not earn enough to decently support a wife. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by me and just read by the Clerk is in the interest of the letter carriers of our country. It is their bill, their hope—the one thing in legislation they ask for, and pray for, and demand. I offer it in good faith in their name, and under our rules I do not think it is, or can be, subject to a point of order.

This amendment is the letter carriers' bill introduced by me in this House at the beginning of this Congress. I have introduced this letter carriers' bill in every Congress for the past ten years. It never gets out of the committee of the gentleman from Indiana. It is there now. It is sleeping in that committee, and it will never wake up—never come out. I am satisfied the Republicans on the Post-Office Committee will never report it favorably. The bill is so short that I will ask the indulgence of the House while I read it. Besides, I want it to go in the RECORD as part of my remarks, so that all who are concerned in the matter can read it and judge of its merit. I introduced it in this House on the 13th day of last December. It is entitled "A bill to increase the pay of letter carriers," and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of more than 75,000 population for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service shall be $800; for the third year of service shall be $1,000; for the fourth year of service and thereafter shall be $1,200. And after June 30, 1906, the pay of letter carriers in cities of a population of under 75,000 for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service, $800; for the third year of service and thereafter, $1,000.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

That is all there is to it—a most commendable bill. Why should it not be reported? Why should it be smothered in the committee? Why should it not be presented to the House and the Members given an opportunity to vote for it or against it? We want a record on this bill. We want to fix responsibility. We want to find out who are the friends and who are the enemies of the letter carriers. I am now, always have been, and always will be a friend of the letter carriers. I am proud to say that. They are my friends and I am their friend. The Government in all its service has no more honest, no more tireless, no more faithful employees. Their claims are just and should be recognized, and sooner or later they will be recognized and granted. So keep up the fight.

These letter carriers are the most efficient, the hardest worked in all the country's service, and the poorest paid. The letter carriers of the land are compelled to toil day in and day out—in sunshine and in storm, in winter and in summer, in all kinds of weather—long, long weary hours, and taking all other employees in the various Departments of the Federal Government as a basis for comparison, it can not be denied that the letter carriers render the most and the hardest work for the smallest remuneration. Let us be just to these honest, hard-working, faithful men.

Now, sir, why is it when every Democrat, I believe, on this side of the House is anxious for a favorable report of this bill, is anxious to have it passed, is anxious to vote for it to make it a law—why is it, I ask, that the Republicans in this House smother the bill every session in the committee? Why is the Republican party against the letter carriers' bill? Is it because a few Republican leaders of this House are opposed to giving the letter carriers decent wages? Or is it because the Republicans are so busy legislating for monopoly that they have no time to legislate for man? Let the Republican party answer in the coming campaign.

Now, sir, I want to state that in every Congress in which I have been a Member I have introduced this letter carriers' bill for the benefit of the letter carriers. During all this time I have worked as hard as I could, before the committee, with Members of the House, in season and out of season, continually, to get a favorable report, but all in vain. I never could get the Republicans on the committee to report the bill and do justice to the deserving letter carriers of the country. Time and time again on the floor of this House, year in and year out, I have pleaded for just treatment, decent wages, and fair play for the letter carriers. If there ever was a bill introduced in this House that ought to appeal to every Member as a matter of right and justice it is my bill for the letter carriers.

I plead to-day, as I have pleaded in the past, for justice for the deserving letter carriers. Their request for living wages is the demand of humanity. My heart goes out to them. I can not refrain from making this appeal in their behalf for simple justice. How I wish it were in my power to aid them, to pass and enact into law this bill they all want, they all pray for; this bill that is so fair and so just, that appeals to every right-thinking citizen in all the land, and that challenges adverse criticism. How much time and money we waste here for useless and worthless things! It is terrible when one soberly considers it all—and then, again, so much for the few, so little for the many. How easy for the monopolies and the powerful to pass a bill—a bad bill—and how difficult for the poor and the weak, the many, to pass a bill—a good bill. [Applause.]

How poorly, how miserably the letter carriers are paid! And yet, take them all in all, they are courteous, long suffering, uncomplaining, honest, assiduous, and industrious. How few of our citizens ever think of their trials, their wants, their health, and their families and little ones at home. Under the present law they do not, and can not, earn enough, no matter how long they have been in the service of the Government or how many hours a day they labor, to keep body and soul together. And what do they get? A mere pittance a month that is not enough to economically support one man. It is a disgrace, a crying shame. Many of these letter carriers have wives and children—little homes—and these wives and children in many cases are to-day in want.

The head of the household does not get paid enough by the Government to live halfway decently. But it is not the Government's fault, it is the fault of the Republican leaders here in Congress. I want to appeal to the Republicans of this House, in the name of justice and fair play, in the name of decency, that when they are doing so much for organized capital, so much for criminal syndicates, so much for monopolies, for God's sake to do something for the poor letter carriers. [Applause.]

Let us be honest. Let us be just. Let us be true to the dictates of our nobler impulses, and if we are, this amendment—the letter carriers' bill, so honest and so just and so earnestly desired—will be adopted, speedily passed, and a law on our statute books. Is there a man here opposed to it? If so, let him come out in the open and have the courage to get up and say so. Do not strike it down and out on a technical point of order. Who is opposed to this amendment on its merits? If any there be, let him get up and say so. I pause for an answer. No one opposed to it, and yet the bill lies in the committee, and it seems impossible to ever get it out.

The friends of the letter carriers in this House can not get the letter carriers' bill reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Under our rules we can not move to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill. Our only remedy, our last resort, is to move to amend this post-office appropriation bill by offering the letter carriers' bill as an amendment, and draw the amendment in such a way that it will not be subject to a point of order, which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], the chairman of the committee, always makes to every effort that is made to aid and benefit the letter carriers. He gladly and quickly and yearly increases the appropriations for the railroads for carrying the mails, but he inhumanly and stubbornly, year in and year out, refuses to increase the appropriation for the letter carriers for carrying the mail. Everything for soulless monopoly; nothing for flesh-and-blood man. What a contrast! What a spectacle! What a shame! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have now made my old speech, as the gentleman from Indiana says, for the letter carriers. I shall not at present discuss the matter further. But I shall continue the fight for justice to the letter carriers until the battle is won.

Now, sir, just a word in regard to the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana. I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order; it is a limitation on the appropriation. It has been held over and over again that a limitation of this character on an appropriation is in order. I believe I am sustained by precedent. We shall have a vote on the amendment. I want to get a vote here to-day on my amendment to see how many Members of this House are in favor of doing justice to the letter carriers. I regret to see that there are so many empty chairs around. I am sorry that Members knowing this question was coming up stay away or go out in the lobby, and then tell the people at home who ask for justice for the letter carriers, who want their bill passed, that they are in favor of it, but they can not get a vote on it. Now, I am going to give the Members present the opportunity to vote for it. About one-third of the membership of the House is out of the House, and yet every one of the Members knew that this question was coming up to-day. However, I am willing to take the judgment of the Members that are here, and I hope every man who is in favor of decent wages being paid by the Government for faithful service will vote in favor of the amendment I have offered.

In regard to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, made by the gentleman from Indiana on this amendment, I desire to call the Chair's attention to page 3529 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 22, 1904, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was in the Chair, and he ruled on an identical amendment and declared that it was in order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say that while the amendment as drawn is under the limitation, it necessarily changes the law even for one year, and when it does change the law for any length of time, however slight, it violates the rule, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A moment ago, in deciding a point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], the Chair very briefly attempted to distinguish between the present condition and the condition that existed heretofore in reference to limitation. The same conditions are present now by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], and the Chair, for the same reason, sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the Chair to overrule the decision of Judge CRUMPACKER?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SULZER. And I desire to be heard briefly on the appeal.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I object. It is not subject to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Indiana should learn parliamentary law when he goes home. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will be heard on the appeal.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, it is very seldom and always with regret that I appeal from the decision of the Chair, especially when the Chair is occupied by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], whom I look upon as one of the best parliamentarians in Congress. But in this instance I am constrained to do so because I fear the Chair, who has just been selected by his party as chairman of the Republican Congressional committee, has for some reason or other—and we must draw our own conclusion—overruled a precedent that should be followed in this House. I thought the Chairman was such a good friend of the letter carriers that he would follow that precedent heretofore made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Now, sir, this identical amendment, to go no further back than two years ago, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was in the chair, was presented by an amendment offered by the gentleman from California, Mr. Livernash. Judge CRUMPACKER, in his decision (p. 3529 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), said:

> The amendment offered by the gentleman from California is to strike out the phrase "twenty-two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars" * * * and substitute therefor "twenty-three million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars: Provided, That no part of the appropriation shall be used for said purpose unless in the use thereof the letter carriers hereinafter mentioned shall be paid salaries as follows."

The language of my amendment is identical with this phraseology. The two amendments are on all fours. Judge CRUMPACKER goes on to say:

> The Chair reads only enough of the amendment to illustrate its character. * * *

The entire matter was thoroughly debated at that time by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and by several gentlemen on the floor, and after a full and careful discussion of the proposition Judge CRUMPACKER ruled against the point of order.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is very easy to override and overrule an established precedent; but I say, and I have had some experience as a presiding officer, I say there is nothing so dangerous in the history of parliamentary practice and of parliamentary assemblages, as to have chairmen, or speakers, one year rule one way and the next year rule another way on an identical proposition. If that is to go on in this House, no man who is a Member of it will be able to tell if a question arises where he stands, or what his rights are, or what he can do under the rules. He will be simply at the mercy of the arbitrary will and autocratic power of the gentleman who happens to be in the chair. We must follow precedent. If this House permits this decision to be set aside in this way, I predict that the time is not far distant when the House of Representatives of the United States will be the laughingstock of every parliamentary body in the world. I believe in following precedents, especially when I believe they are right and in accordance with good parliamentary practice.

As a Member of this House for ten years I have never voted to override the decision of the Chair when in my opinion the Chair was right. I believe the decision of the gentleman now in the chair is wrong, against precedent and good parliamentary practice. I shall not waste time in further discussing it. I submit this question to the House, and declare that if it sustains the Chairman and overrides the precedent heretofore made, I will submit the case of the rights of the letter carriers to the people in the coming Congressional campaign and let them decide between Philip drunk and Philip sober. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires simply to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from New York bases his argument on a decision rendered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] when he was in the chair. The same gentleman, in debate upon the floor two days after rendering the decision, in an explanation in reference to that decision, ended it in these words—I am simply reading his conclusion:

I therefore believe the decision I made on day before yesterday, while occupying the chair, in ruling upon this particular proposition, was erroneous.

[Laughter and applause.]

The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. SULZER. That is not in the record of the gentleman's decision. It may be in record of the gentleman's subsequent remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SULZER. I may be out of order, but I think the decision is good law and common sense.

The question was taken on the appeal; and there were—ayes, 128, noes 14.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14 strike out lines 1 and 2 and substitute "$23,228,000: Provided, That none of such sum so appropriated shall be expended in cities having a population of over 250,000, except to carriers as to whom it has been provided by statute that they shall be paid as follows: Carriers who have served more than three years, whose salaries shall be $1,200 per annum; carriers who have served more than two years, whose salaries shall be $1,000 per annum; carriers who have served more than one year, whose salaries shall be $800 per annum, and carriers who have served less than one year, whose salaries shall be $600 per annum, and such substitutes as are now provided by law."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that amendment. It is contrary to existing law and the statute formerly read.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the earlier decision of the Chair, based on the second decision made by the gentleman from Indiana which I cited, the Chair held that the amendment which I then offered was not in order, for the reason that under it the Postmaster-General might claim that we gave him the right to change salaries, and so this amendment——

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; I am talking strictly on the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know how the gentleman voted on my appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know how you voted on my appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order; his colleague declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET of New York. So that I have added this language, "except to carriers as to whom it has been provided by statute that there shall be paid as follows," covering the point raised by the Chair, which was that the other amendment was ruled out as a limitation because it did not provide that salaries could not be changed. This amendment does so provide; and therefore under the preceding decision it is strictly in order. [Cries of "Rule!"] I would like to call the Chair's attention to the language written in my own fair hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is attempting to ascertain what that language is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I thought I would have to read it. "As to whom it has been provided by statute that they shall be."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have only to say that no construction of this amendment would show that it failed to change the existing law to which I referred a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York make it a little more plain to the Chair what the proposed effect of his interlineation is, and the amendment as changed by the interlineation?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The amendment as changed by the interlineation, if adopted, would not affect a single salary. It would simply provide that in cities of over 250,000 no carrier whatever could be paid, and thus bring it entirely within the power of Congress. We can not on an appropriation bill change existing law, but we can refuse appropriation for any existing office.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It would not be paid until there was this legislation. As it is, it requires two acts in order to change the salaries—one to get the change of salary and the other the appropriation bill. This is an appropriation bill and will not change existing law. A carrier in cities of over 250,000 can not be paid a single dollar under the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman this question: Does not the gentleman suppose that the administrative officer would consider that Congress by this act intended to change the law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not when he reads these words, "except as to whom it has been provided by statute that they shall be paid as follows."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I failed to understand the amendment as it was read the first time. Do I understand the effect of this amendment, if adopted into law, would be that a certain number of carriers would be dispensed with and paid no salary unless there should be some additional legislation?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be this: That in cities of over 250,000—of which I will say parenthetically the city in which I live is one—there can be no carriers paid at all until a statute is passed grading their salaries as provided by this law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then it would mean, in effect, an increase in the salaries?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, not at all. It would mean an absolute exclusion of so much of the appropriation as applies to cities of over 250,000. It is not a dollar of increase.

Mr. OVERSTREET. This amendment violates the rule by changing more laws than I had first thought. The law now authorizes certain carriers to be employed. This amendment would nullify that law. A change of law is not necessarily a fixing of salaries; but you can not repeal a law without changing it. That is what this does.

Mr. BENNET of New York. This does not repeal anything.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Its nullifies the law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It nullifies nothing. There are these carriers in the cities of over 250,000. They would remain there.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. As I understand the gentleman, his real purpose, by the effect of this amendment, is to have other legislation which will result in a change of the salaries of carriers.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, there is now in the committee——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask the gentleman for a "yes" or "no."

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman is not entitled to demand that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, I can ask it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; and not get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very clear that it is intended as a change of law, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to read a little more fully what was said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] in explaining, two days after his decision, why he thought he was in error; and in that connection the Chair desires to say that that statement is found on page 3638 of the RECORD of the proceedings of the House in the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and the RECORD discloses the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] was on the floor at the time. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana said:

But upon reflection and subsequent investigation of the provisions of that amendment, I have no doubt that the Post-Office Department or any court would hold that it was clearly the intention of Congress to provide an increase of the pay of letter carriers in accordance with the provisions of the proposed amendment. I think any court would hold that to be the clear purpose and intention of Congress in adopting the amendment. And if that be true, of course it was new legislation, of course it changed existing law, and the amendment was clearly subject to a point of order. I therefore believe that the decision I made on the day before yesterday while occupying the chair, in ruling upon this particular proposition, was erroneous.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 2, after the word "dollars," add "Provided, That such appropriation shall be available only when it shall have been provided by statute that the leave of absence of carriers who have been thirty or more years in the service may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be extended for such a length of time as he may, in each instance, deem advisable, the service to be performed by a substitute who shall be paid not more than $600 per annum, all sums paid to substitutes to be deducted from the salaries, respectively, of the carriers given such leave."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I should like to be heard just for a moment on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair to the fact that the decision which the Chair last quoted of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was followed by the decision of the then Chairman—and if my recollection is correct, it was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]—and that the ruling was not based at all upon the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, but upon the concession of the gentleman from California, Mr. Livernash, that his amendment did change existing law. And I should like further to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from California, Mr. Livernash, did not contain the qualifying words that have been inserted in this amendment and the one preceding it; that is, that nothing can be done until the existing situation is changed by statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair quoted the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] in answer to the argument of the gentleman from New York, which argument was based wholly upon the decision of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], made two days prior, which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] then conceded to have been erroneous.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, no; I think the Chair is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is talking about the other gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend the remarks I made earlier in the day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $7,100,000: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, direct the discontinuance of any star-route service whenever such service shall be duplicated by rural delivery service.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order on the last proviso, beginning in line 13 and ending in line 16. It is subject to a point of order, but if the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, will accept an amendment which I think will cure my objection, I will not make the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What is the amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. To insert the word "wholly" between the words "be" and "duplicated" in line 15, so that it will read "be wholly duplicated."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Would not the word "entirely" be better than the word "wholly?"

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Inserted after the word "be?"

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I withdraw the point of order and offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 15, before the word "duplicated," insert the word "entirely."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss it?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is new legislation, and my point of order is based upon that fact. My objection to the provision is that there is a movement on foot to reduce the number of services on the free-delivery routes in certain sections of the country, and unless something is done to let the Post-Office Department know that Congress will not submit to this reduction, this reduction will be made, and I am opposed to the abolition of any more star routes until this matter about the rural free delivery is settled. Before we had the free-delivery service there were post-offices all over the country served in most instances by daily star routes. When the rural free delivery came it was a great improvement over the post-office and the star-route service, and was gladly accepted by the people, but if this proposition of the Post-Office Department to reduce the number of deliveries on these routes from six to three times a week prevails the service that will be given to the people of the country districts by rural free delivery will be infinitely worse than what they formerly received from the post-offices and the star routes.

There is no certainty whether the reduction is going to be based upon the number of pieces of mail handled by the route per month or whether some other method will be adopted. I have understood that every route that did not handle 3,000 pieces a month was only to have triweekly service, and again that it was to be 2,000 pieces. I learned from an official of the Department that it would depend not on the number of pieces handled on a route, but upon the number of boxes on the rural free-delivery routes; but whatever scheme they adopt with a view to reducing the number of routes, it is an outrage and a wrong to the people of the country districts. They have substituted the rural free delivery for post-offices. The post-offices have been abolished, and the result is that these people who before the rural free-delivery system went into operation were within 1 or 2 or 3 miles of a post-office will now be deprived of the daily mail service or will have to send 8 or 10 miles for their mail. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the reduction of the star routes anywhere until some assurance can be given by Congress that it will take action to stop the movement to reduce the number of deliveries on the rural free mail routes. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order came too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman from Virginia was on his feet at the time the gentleman from Georgia offered the resolution.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, strike out lines 6 to 16 and insert the following:

"For inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $7,100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star route service the patronage of which shall be served entirely by the extension of rural delivery service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star route service for a patronage which is already entirely served by rural delivery service: And provided further, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to reserve a point of order on that proposition.

Mr. FLOOD. That is what I rose for, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee reserve points of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is a provision by way of limitation on this amendment, and provides for the continuance of the star route service in the ordinary way by contract, except where there is entire duplication by the extension of the rural delivery service. I think the amendment is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana give his attention for a moment? To what does the gentleman intend the amendment to apply, which he has sent to the desk?

Mr. OVERSTREET. As a substitute for lines 6 to 16.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair desired to know. Now, will the gentleman from Indiana explain to the Chair upon what theory he claims the provision in reference to Alaska is justified under the rules?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That provision is justified under the rule only upon the ground that it is a continuing service, and is in the identical language in which it has been carried for a number of years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not find it in last year's bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, yes; this is the language of the current law:

For inland transportation by star route including temporary service for newly established offices, $7,300,000: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor.

That has been the language for a number of years in the various bills carrying appropriations for the postal service.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the language of the proviso is a proper limitation, but the language in reference to Alaska might be more happily chosen.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the Chair permit me before proceeding further to say I will modify the amendment by striking from the amendment I have sent to the Clerk's desk the language relative to Alaska?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, we would like to be heard.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if this is to occasion debate I suggest that we suspend at this time and give way to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, anyone who has followed the course of this general debate must have become impressed with two radically distinct and conflicting emotions; admiration for the high capacity shown by the speakers, and regret that under the rules which govern us the speeches themselves were directed not to some question pending before the House, but delivered into the empty air. By this, Mr. Chairman, I would not be understood as saying that they were irrelevant to matters deeply affecting the public welfare and vividly before the public mind. With hardly an exception they all turned upon questions of vital and pressing political importance, yet hardly one touched a subject with which the House will be suffered to deal. Sitting in Committee of the Whole House to consider a bill making appropriation for the support of the Post-Office Department we have had addresses on the tariff, on immigration, on denaturized alcohol, and on many other subjects entirely remote from the subject before us and wholly unconnected with each other. If years from now some student should undertake to study the RECORD which chronicles our proceedings he would be driven to the conclusion that while nearly every one of those speeches taken by itself was of such excellence that it might have been addressed to a council of sages, yet the whole debate taken together suggested the incoherence, discordance, and dissonance of a lunatic asylum rather than the debate of a highly intelligent, deliberative body. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, my object in taking the floor now is to bring before the House the ridiculous character of the rules which have caused this profligate waste of such excellent material, in the hope that discussion may evolve some means by which these abundant talents, these great potentialities of efficient service, will be utilized for the public benefit—not dissipated to the public discredit.

Mr. Chairman, the recent history of this House shows conclusively that there is not in all this world a body capable of higher legislative service or animated by loftier civic virtue. And yet, sir, it is a melancholy spectacle that this body, which when controlled by the judgment, the intelligence, and the patriotism of its membership has succeeded in producing the most important and triumphant legislative results, when hampered, fettered, and restricted by absurd rules, often sinks to an incapacity almost ludicrous, of which this very debate is a striking illustration. That I do not exaggerate is conclusively proved by our signal success this session in framing and passing a railroad rate bill of singular merit, when we were left free to control our own proceedings, and the utter failure of the House to pass an effective measure last session when it was bound and gagged under restrictions imposed by the Committee on Rules.

You will recall, sir, that last year when this House was called upon to deal with the intricate, perplexing, and almost wholly unexplored field of railroad rate legislation it was placed under a rule which restricted it to adopting the measure recommended by the majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or else adopting the measure recommended by the minority. No power was left in a Member to offer any other amendment, or in the House to consider it. As amendment is the only object and purpose of discussion, where a body is practically unanimous on the principle of a bill, as the House was on that railroad measure, the passage of such a rule simply meant that we threw over upon the Senate the important duty of originating amendments, which all conceded to be necessary. That was not only an abdication of our functions and a renunciation of our duty, but it was a confession of incapacity. For my part, sir, I declined to be a party to such an abasement of this House, membership in which I consider a distinguished honor, and so when the measure was on its passage I refused to vote, asking simply to be recorded "present."

That measure met the fate which the method of its passage invited. It fell stillborn on the threshold of the other Chamber. It was never even considered by the Senate. It was thrown in the wastebasket, its proper destination. There it remained, useless for every purpose, except as a monument to the folly, the incapacity—aye, sir, I will say the disloyalty—with which we renounced our functions, turned our backs upon our obligations, fled from our obvious duty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, contrast with that dreary record of incapacity, of folly, and of failure, the triumphant progress of the bill dealing with the same subject which passed the House this year. When it came before us we were left free to deal with it as we pleased. Full power to offer amendments was left in the hands of every Member. The limit of debate was fixed by a unanimous vote. Every amendment offered was considered and action taken freely upon it. The result was a measure which I venture to say will stand for many years a monument to the patriotism in which it was conceived, the wisdom in which it was framed, and the resolution with which it was passed. [Loud applause.]

I say this, sir, notwithstanding the fact (and largely because of the fact) that since this measure passed this House it has been the subject of vigorous animadversions and very bitter criticism. I take it that these criticisms are in the highest degree a compliment to its merits. The wrongdoers with whom it was intended to deal testify by the vehemence and fury with which they assail it how deeply they realize its efficiency. But, sir, the abuse of miscreants whose crimes it is intended to prevent weighs little in the minds of honest men against the approval of the people whose rights it is drawn to protect. And this it enjoys beyond all question. Conceive for a moment the change in public attitude toward this measure since closing debate on it here. Recall the objections that were advanced to it in this House with so much vehemence, and you have but to examine from day to day the adverse comments in newspapers, the speeches delivered against it, the interviews with railway officials and railway attorneys who condemn it to measure the distance between the grounds occupied by its opponents before discussion in this House began and since its close. Then you will be able to realize the distance that public opinion has traveled under the light and guidance of our proceedings in this body.

Everyone here will remember that when this measure was pending before us, the point dividing its supporters and opponents was the question whether we had any constitutional or moral right to pass it. Some of its opponents said it violated the letter and others the spirit of the Constitution, but they were all unanimous in describing it as a long step toward socialism. Well, these objections have all been quieted. Not one of them has been audible since the close of debate here. If one is still heard occasionally it is in a voice so feeble and so rare that it merely serves to attest the overwhelming preponderance of public opinion. Gentlemen who were then most vehement in opposing it now claim to be its most ardent supporters. One after another popularly supposed to be bitterly hostile to it objects strenuously now to being counted among its opponents. But while he wants to be recognized among its advocates, he protests that he wishes to perfect it.

Mr. Chairman, no one among the supporters of the bill objects to any suggestion for its improvement. But I believe its friends should be vigilant, and I am sure they will be vigilant, to see that under cover of attempts to perfect the measure its enemies will not be permitted to emasculate it. We must see that it is not destroyed by mutilation disguised as amendments, now that efforts to destroy it by open opposition are no longer considered profitable or even safe.

Mr. Chairman, it is quite true that although the grounds of criticism advanced in this House are abandoned, new ones have been evolved, which, though less weighty, enjoy the advantage of not having been subjected to the test of our scrutiny. Of these the most formidable now directed against the Hepburn bill is that it fails to provide for a judicial review of all orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. For that omission this House has been denounced as incapable, negligent, and indifferent. Now that I have the floor I do not know how I can better improve the time at my disposal than by employing some of it in refuting this criticism, and sending it to join all its predecessors. I do not think, sir, that will be a very difficult task; I think the very slightest examination of this last objection will show that among criticisms it deserves to be classed as a survival of the loosest. [Laughter.]

First, Mr. Chairman, let me say a word as to its source. This objection is not advanced openly by the interests chiefly affected by the bill. It proceeds ostensibly from a rather new product of our constitutional evolution—the constitutional lawyer—the great constitutional lawyer, who chooses a legislative body, rather than a judicial tribunal, for the display of his qualities.

It is well to observe that the constitutional lawyer in a legislative body is always a "great" constitutional lawyer.

Now, I confess that I regard this legislative constitutional lawyer with something of the awe which attaches to everything beyond our comprehension. [Laughter.] I do not know that I am able to describe him. I think I know him when I see him, for he has certain unmistakable characteristics. But to describe you must understand, and I admit he is far beyond the power of my intellectuals. Ordinarily our conception of law is a uniform rule of conduct made binding upon all members of a community, or at least on a large majority of them, by the sovereign authority, whatever it may be; and the function of the lawyer, we plain mortals believe, is to ascertain this rule, to define and expound it, and thus promote unanimous obedience to it. But while the essential function of the ordinary lawyer is to promote uniformity of the law, the activities of the great constitutional lawyer in a legislative body, far from tending to produce uniformity of constitutional construction, operate to produce radically different results. Whenever he is active in either branch of Congress we find just as many different constitutions as there are great constitutional lawyers to expound the organic law.

In this particular case the constitutional lawyers all declare that the Hepburn bill is constitutionally infirm somehow or other, but no two of them agree in pointing out the precise seat of infirmity. The constitutional lawyer is always vehement in warning us that before we undertake any measure we must be sure of its constitutionality; that he alone is competent to advise us; that next to the duty of acceping him as infallible comes that of regarding all other constitutional lawyers as unsound, if not worse; that we must be wary even of trusting their quotations lest instead of giving us the judgment of a court they mislead us into accepting as its decision the language by which a minority sought to show that the authority of the majority depended entirely upon the number of judges who constituted it, not upon the weight of reasons which justified it.

Mr. Chairman, if we must wait until the great constitutional lawyers agree upon any subject, it is plain that we would never take a step in any direction. We would stand paralyzed at the threshold of every legislative enterprise, amazed and bewildered—puzzled to distinguish amid the din of their vociferation how much of it is advice to us and how much of it denunciation of each other. I defy any man to define Congress itself according to the constitutional lawyers after he has read three of their speeches. [Laughter.] Some of them say that we have all power, others that we have no power. Some that we can extend our authority over the courts, that we can not only confer jurisdiction on them or withhold it, as we please, but even after we have granted it that we can control its exercise—at least so far as to determine what persons or classes may have the benefit of it; that we can give it to the courts, as it were, with a string, so that a writ may be left within access of our favorites and pulled far beyond the reach of any person or corporation whom we dislike or distrust. Others, again, tell us that we are but the shadow of a legislative body; that we are not even an independent or coordinate branch of government, but, so to speak, an antechamber to some other department; that our power consists in merely proposing laws, which, by the permission of another body, may acquire the force of statutes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to me—an ordinary citizen, a humble Member of this House—a constitutional lawyer is an imposing personage before a court empowered to decide a constitutional question and whose authoritative interpretations of the Constitution he aids by his arguments. For that very reason, sir, it seems to me that a legislative body whose function is wholly nonjudicial is not a proper theater for disputatious attorneyship, but essentially one for constructive statesmanship.

I can not believe that the function of Congress is a mystery difficult to comprehend or the duty of its Members a puzzle too perplexing for the ordinary mind to solve, as these gentlemen would persuade us. It seems to me that the duty of Congress is to examine closely the condition of the country and keep itself constantly informed of everything affecting the common welfare. Wherever a wrong is found to exist with which the nation can deal more effectively than a State, it is the business of Congress to suggest a remedy. If the courts hold that the legislation we consider desirable is beyond our power to enact, our duty to suggest a remedy is none the less binding, except that instead of proceeding by the enactment of a law we should proceed by proposing a constitutional amendment. Our duty to propose an amendment to the Constitution when advisable is just as binding as our duty to change the law when that is within our power and we believe it is essential to the common welfare. [Applause.] If, therefore, we find that a wrong exists anywhere which the National Government in our judgment is alone competent to redress, and some great constitutional lawyer should undertake to raise objections with that wonderful ingenuity which enables us always to distinguish him, not by numerous decisions of courts upholding his contentions, but by the wonder and awe of his legislative associates at the multiplicity of his quotations, the strangeness of his phrases, the majesty of his mien, and the mystery of his meaning. [Laughter and applause.]

It is not for us to waste time in abstract and fanciful speculations about the course which the courts may pursue toward the remedial measures we may enact. Face to face with a wrong which we believe a State can not cure, it is our duty to find a remedy some way or other. Unless the Supreme Court has held specifically that we can not deal with it, our first step must be in the direction of legislation. The way to ascertain definitely whether a law which we believe will prove effective is constitutional or unconstitutional is not by abandoning ourselves to a maelstrom of speculations about what the court may hold or has held on subjects more or less kindred, but to legislate, and take the judgment of the court on that specific proposal. We can tell whether the enactment is constitutional or unconstitutional when the court pronounces upon it and not before. Even if the court declares it unconstitutional its decision will not reduce us to helplessness. If it drive us from establishing a remedy by legislation it will by that very act direct us to propose a remedy by constitutional amendment. Having framed a suitable amendment and proposed it to the legislatures of the States, our duty will have been accomplished. The final step toward full redress will then be with the bodies most directly representative of the people affected by the wrong.

But, sir, let us consider in the light of common sense the one constitutional objection to this measure on which the constitutional lawyers approach coherence among themselves.

We are told this measure is unconstitutional because it does not provide specifically that the courts shall have power to review all decisions and orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In support of that contention we have mountains of law books piled upon desks, and strident voices filling the country with mysterious and contradictory quotations from them. Without any disposition to join this mystical and awful band, confining myself to the rôle of simple citizen, investigating this subject in the light of common sense, I ask the committee to consider what it is for which these constitutional lawyers contend, so far as their contention is intelligible. Let us see for a moment how far we can go along with them and where we must part company with them.

They begin with the proposition that no person's property can be taken without due process of law. On that they can not raise a dispute with me.

From this they proceed to argue that if a rate be fixed so low that a railway must conduct its business at a loss, its property would be taken without due process of law, and therefore its constitutional rights would be violated. Nobody can object to that proposition. I certainly do not. I go further—I say not only would a rate which entailed actual loss in operation be unconstitutional, but one so low as to prevent the railway from earning a profit on the capital by which it is operated would be an invasion of its constitutional right. Now, to that point the ordinary citizen can walk side by side with the constitutional lawyer, understanding his phrases, and sympathizing with his purposes.

But just here the great constitutional lawyer shows his greatness by spreading his constitutional wings and taking a flight far beyond the power of a sensible man to follow him. Because the Railway Commission is required to ascertain and decide what is a reasonable rate, the great constitutional lawyer holds this mere decision would be confiscation of property if the rate which it fixes be so low that it would preclude the railway from earning sufficient revenues to meet its expenses. How in the name of all that is reasonable to anyone, not a constitutional—a great constitutional—lawyer, can the Commission of itself by any order or conclusion impair or injure the property of a railroad? How can the Commission, under this bill, confiscate property or disturb it in any way? If the act empowered the Commission to enforce its own order by issuing its own writ to a marshal or some other executive officer commanding him to take the property of the railway or to restrain any of its officers, then there might be reason to claim that a failure to provide specifically for a judicial review of its proceedings would make the act creating it unconstitutional. But, Mr. Chairman, the Commission of itself can not touch one penny's worth of property belonging to a corporation. It will not have power to move a single railway car a single foot, nor to change the location of a single wheelbarrow, nor of a single pickax, nor of a single nail belonging to a railway corporation.

This bill does not empower a railway company to sue out an injunction restraining action by the Commission, for the simple reason that the Commission has no power to do any act that could of itself injure the railway. All that the railroad need do, if it considers a rate fixed by the Commission would impair the security of its property, is simply to ignore the order—to stand pat, if I may borrow from the terminology of the majority a phrase of singular force. [Laughter and applause.] But we all know that the very essence of standing pat is that you do not want any assistance from the pack. The railway does not need any aid from the pack—that is to say, from government through any of its departments—in order to stand pat—to ignore an order of the Commission. A writ of injunction could be of no aid to anyone in standing pat, and therefore no power is given by this bill to bring suit for it. Why, you gentlemen have shown that to stand pat effectively nothing is necessary except a firm purpose coupled with vigorous appetite. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the absurdity of this clamor that the Hepburn bill seeks to invade the power of the courts becomes self-evident when we realize that it is through the courts themselves any action of the Commission must be made operative. The Commission of itself, as I said, can not touch one single thing belonging to the railway or affect its property in the slightest degree. Before its conclusion or order can have the slightest effect it must do what? Why, it must go itself into court and ask that a summons be issued to the railway. For what purpose must the railroad be summoned? To show cause why it should not be compelled to obey the order of the Commission. Can anybody conceive that on the return to such a citation the court will refuse to hear any cause arising under the Constitution or the laws which the railway may advance to explain or justify its refusal? In the light of this simple statement how extravagant and nonsensical is this one assertion upon which the constitutional lawyers are a chorus, that this bill aims to shut the railways out of court while their property is invaded.

Sir, instead of being a device to shut the railways out of court, it is a plan to bring them into court. By the courts and the courts alone can they be affected in their property, their profits, or their prospects. What, then, in its last analysis, is this demand that provision for a liberal judicial review must be inserted in this bill to make it constitutional? A judicial review to be exercised by whom? By judges, of course. Over whom? Why, over the judges themselves. Is not all this clamor and rhetoric about the constitutional necessity of providing for a judicial review tantamount to telling us that to make this law constitutional we must make it absurd, grotesque, fantastical; we must equip the judges with power to take themselves under control, to put fetters and bonds on their own limbs, lest they use them to damage the very persons who are clamoring for this extraordinary extension of judicial authority. When we put restraint on a man's limbs it is because we believe that if they are left free he will use them to the damage of his neighbor. But here it is insisted that the courts must be given specific power to restrain themselves, lest they do some damage to the very persons who insist that these powers which they fear may be abused shall be largely extended. Has anything so extravagant as this been heard anywhere outside opera bouffe? I know nothing parallel to it except in that comic opera called "Iolanthe," performed some twenty years ago, where the Lord Chancellor ponders profoundly the question whether if he married one of his own wards he would be in contempt of his own court and whether he must commit himself to custody for such a deliberate breach of his own authority. [Laughter and aplause.]

To show the extraordinary misapplication of extensive reading characteristic of our constitutional lawyers, I ask gentlemen of the committee to examine in the light of common sense the decision by which it is sought to justify this claim that the failure to provide specifically for a judicial review makes the Hepburn bill unconstitutional. A moment's examination will show that, far from justifying such a conclusion, this decision shows clearly that even if a review by the courts were expressly forbidden the provision forbidding it would be disregarded and the law outside that one provision would be held constitutional. The decision to which I refer is the one rendered in what is known as the "Minnesota Milk case" (Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418). It was an action brought by the attorney-general of the State of Minnesota for a writ of mandamus to compel the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company to reduce the rate it had been charging for transporting milk between two points in the State to a lower rate which had been ordered by the State railway commission.

The Minnesota law under which the proceedings were instituted specifically provided that upon the application for a writ of mandamus to enforce its provisions nothing should be heard or considered by the court except the one question—whether the railway company had obeyed or disobeyed the order of the commission—the conclusion of the commission being declared conclusive as to the facts upon all parties. The supreme court of Minnesota held that act constitutional in all its features and issued its writ commanding the railway to obey the order of the commission. On appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States held that as the Minnesota law denying the railway any opportunity to be heard in defense of the rates it had imposed had been held constitutional by the Minnesota court, the court here was bound by its decision, and as construed by the Minnesota courts the whole scheme of rate control which it established was an attempt to deprive a corporation of its property without an opportunity to be heard—that is to say, without due process of law—and this no State, through its legislative or executive or judicial department, or through all of them combined, could be permitted to do.

But all through this decision of the United States Supreme Court it is stated plainly that if the court in Minnesota had held the limitation which the statute placed on its powers was unconstitutional and, disregarding it, had given the railway a hearing, the whole proceedings would have been in perfect consonance with the Federal Constitution. Every word and line of the prevailing opinion invites the Minnesota court to revise its decision and make the system of railway rate control in that State entirely valid and effective by simply holding unconstitutional and of no effect that provision of the law which undertook to make the decision of the commission final without requiring that parties affected by it should have an opportunity to be heard in defense of their property. Instead of reversing absolutely the order of the Minnesota court, instead of finally dismissing its writ, as it must have done if the decision had held the whole Minnesota statute to be unconstitutional, the court here did what? I will read the exact language of its final judgment. I shall not undertake to describe it. Every constitutional lawyer thinks that any description of judicial utterance by anyone else is always inaccurate and sometimes depraved. [Laughter.] Here are the exact words of the court:

> In view of the opinion delivered by that court, it may be impossible for any further proceedings to be taken other than to dismiss proceedings for a mandamus, if the court should adhere to its opinion that under the statute it can not investigate judicially the reasonableness of the rates fixed by the Commission. Still, the question will be open for review, and the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the supreme court of Minnesota, entered May 4, 1888, awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus in this case be reversed, and the case be REMANDED TO THAT COURT WITH AN INSTRUCTION FOR FURTHER PROCEEDINGS NOT INCONSISTENT WITH THE OPINION OF THIS COURT.

Thus you see the action of the Supreme Court of the United States was not to hold that the absence of a specific provision for a judicial review makes a bill of this character unconstitutional, or even that a provision expressly prohibiting a judicial review would be necessarily fatal to its constitutionality, but to send back the case with a plain intimation that if the supreme court of Minnesota revised its decision and allowed the railway a hearing notwithstanding the prohibition of the statute, the Minnesota scheme of railway control would be perfectly constitutional and could be enforced by all the power of the State. Is it conceivable by anybody, not a constitutional lawyer—a great constitutional lawyer—in a legislative body, that this same court, sitting here, will refuse to adopt for itself the rule which by this very decision it invites the supreme court of Minnesota to adopt for that State? Is it conceivable that the Supreme Court of the United States would give to the silence of this bill a force and effect which it holds here should not have been given to the express words of the Minnesota statute?

Sir, the measure which passed this House is based on the assumption that the Constitution itself has given the courts all the power they can exercise with credit to themselves, with safety to our political system, and with advantage to the people. The best feature of the bill is that it has not attempted to improve the definition of judicial power embodied in the Constitution. Such an attempt would be idle, if not disastrous, for to extend that power would be vicious, to define it would be superfluous, to restrict it would be impossible.

But, sir, apart from its constitutionality, many of our critics contend that as a matter of policy, as a matter of right and justice, as a matter of sound legislation the measure passed by this House should have contained a provision for what is called "a liberal court review." Let us examine this criticism and weigh its merits.

And, first, what is meant by "a liberal court review," I should like to know? Liberal to whom, sir? Why, liberal to the very rogues whose shameless and repeated betrayals of their trust—plundering the corporations they are administering and the people they are bound to serve with rigid but cheerful impartiality—[laughter] have made this legislation absolutely necessary to the preservation of order and the vindication of justice. How can a government be liberal anyway? What field of liberality is open to it? I have pointed out more than once on this floor that if government undertakes to be liberal in one place it must be restrictive in another. If in attempting to deal with crime we are liberal to criminals, then we must be disloyal to the people whom they plunder.

We are not here to treat with crime, to placate it or ask for the forbearance of criminals. We are here to prevent crime by strengthening the law against its perpetration. I would, sir, I could say with any semblance of justification that we are here to punish criminals; but, alas, that would be the language of boastfulness—extravagant and preposterous—so long as the criminals are not mere pilferers of pennies but plunderers of millions. [Applause.] But let us consider the merits of this criticism apart from the terms in which it is expressed. Should we, as a matter of policy, provide what is called a liberal court review? Should we, in other words, establish a judicial review of all orders by the Commission fixing a fair and reasonable rate for the transportation of commodities by railroads?

To answer this question intelligently it is essential that we understand it fully.

Mr. Chairman, among honest men there can be very little difference of opinion upon this question, once its significance is made entirely clear. I believe that nine-tenths of all the disputes which have divided virtuous men would be obviated if at the very beginning the grounds of difference between them were thoroughly ascertained and clearly defined. I remember in my school days listening to a maxim that to teach effectively one must begin by defining accurately. Well, he who would discuss any subject intelligently or profitably must follow the same rule. I believe many gentlemen who appear to be discussing now what they conceive to be differences of opinion over one question are really discussing two wholly different questions. This confusion of thought is not confined to legislative assemblies or even to the great constitutional lawyers who have contributed so much to the mystery of debate. It has reached the Supreme Court, as is shown by this very Minnesota milk case. I am not reading from this volume now for the purpose of swelling the chorus of constitutional speculations, but for the purpose of showing how far diversity of opinion, even in the fountain of constitutional law, may be caused by misapprehension of terms. Judge Blatchford, writing the opinion of the majority, says:

> The question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring the process of law for its determination.

Mr. Justice Bradley, writing the minority opinion (and two very respectable authorities, Mr. Justice Gray and Mr. Justice Lamar, concurred with him), begins by saying:

> I can not agree to the decision of the court in this case. It practically overrules Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113) and the several railroad cases that were decided at the same time. The governing principle of those cases was that the regulation and settlement of the fares of railroads and other public accommodations is a legislative prerogative and not a judicial one. This is a principle which I regard as of great importance.

And farther on he says:

> But it is said that all charges should be reasonable, and that none but reasonable charges can be exacted; and it is urged that what is a reasonable charge is a judicial question. On the contrary it is preeminently a legislative one, involving considerations of policy as well as of remuneration, and is usually determined by the legislature by fixing a maximum of charges in the charter of the company, or afterwards, if its hands are not tied by contract.

Now, here appear to be two radically irreconcilable positions and yet I believe that both these eminent jurists were entirely correct, except that instead of the same question, as they supposed, they were really discussing two different questions, or rather, they were discussing two different aspects of one question. They were like the two knights of the story, who, riding along a road from opposite directions, met in front of a statue bearing a shield and, having exchanged salutations, one of them remarked what a very handsome silver shield that was, and the other said, yes, the shield was undoubtedly very fine, but it was of gold, not silver. The first repeated it was of silver, and the second insisted it was of gold. From expressions of doubt about the accuracy of each other's vision they passed to imputations on each other's veracity and soon fell to fighting, as was the fashion in those days when any dispute was to be settled. A Druid passing by some two hours afterwards found one dead and the other in the very throes of dissolution. Bending over the dying man he asked him how they had come to be in such a plight, who replied: "That caitiff pretended yonder shield is of silver and I had to give him the lie." "And of what metal did you say it is?" "Gold, of course," said the moribund, gathering all his remaining energies to emphasize his words. "You do not mean to insinuate that I was wrong?" "Alas, my friend," said the priest, "you were not wrong and neither was your adversary. You were right and he was right. The shield is gold on one side and silver on the other. If either of you had taken the trouble to look on both sides instead of lying here now, one dead and the other dying, you would both be moving toward the defense of the soil which you have been staining by blood shed in fratricidal strife."

So I believe that in these discussions and disputes about the body or tribunal which should be empowered to decide finally what constitutes a fair and reasonable rate much of the ill temper, much of the vehement speech would be obviated if we once came to realize that there are two aspects of this question; that in one aspect it is a judicial question, the final decision of which we can not take away from the courts if we would; while in the other it is a political question, which is under our exclusive control, the right to decide which we can not abdicate nor share with any body or with any other department of government.

Mr. Chairman, all difficulty about distinguishing between the sense in which the question of what constitutes a fair and reasonable rate is judicial and the sense in which it is legislative will be resolved if we recur to a few propositions laid down in the debate on the rate bill when it was before this House. None of these propositions have been questioned anywhere since the close of that discussion, so far as I know.

It is now, I believe, universally accepted that a railway is essentially a public function though operated by private capital; that as a public function it is subject to control and regulation by the state, and the capital engaged in it is entitled to security. The duty of government toward these two elements is therefore twofold: To exact efficient service from the corporation, and to maintain in absolute security the capital by which that service is rendered; and security of capital includes its right to be employed at a profit—a profit on the capital remember, not on the capitalization; on the property actually invested, not on a false statement of it; on the service by which a community is benefited, not on devices more or less ingenious by which a community is plundered.

If property embarked in railways is entitled to a profit, it must be an actual profit—a profit that is at least tangible. The amount of that profit will not be difficult to define. It can hardly be doubted that the courts will insist property invested in railways or any public enterprise must be left free to earn an amount equal to the minimum profit that money will earn anywhere at the time. That minimum profit is easily ascertained. It is simply the current rate of interest which money will bring in the open market, and of this rate the courts will take judicial cognizance. At this moment, if the question came before them, they would find that the rate which a railway must be left free to earn is somewhere between 3 and 4 per cent on its actual capital. Any law, or order made by authority of law, must be set aside as void under the Constitution which undertook to make railway rates so low that a corporation would not earn such an amount as the courts finally determine to be the minimum profit consistent with its constitutional right. Whether a rate is fair and reasonable in this sense—that is to say, whether it violates or respects the constitutional security of property embarked in the operation of railways—is a question which the courts must determine. Nothing we could do here can limit their power in this respect, and that power the Hepburn bill in no way seeks to disturb.

But there is another aspect of the question, which is not judicial but legislative, which concerns not the constitutional security of property, but a great question of public policy with which the political side of the Government alone is competent to deal. In this country it is a policy of government—whether wise or unwise would be profitless at this moment to discuss, because it is a settled policy—to enlist private enterprise in the operation of public franchises. Now, the only way by which private individuals can be induced to invest capital in this or any form of public service is by offering them opportunity to earn adequate profits.

How much that profit should be—what constitutes such a fair and reasonable rate as will allow such a profit to be earned—and thus encourage the investment of capital in this form of public service, is a question of policy to be decided by the political or legislative department, with which the courts could not deal effectively, even if we sought to bestow the power upon them. This recognition of a dual aspect to the question of what constitutes a fair and reasonable rate—one touching the fair and reasonable rate which must be allowed to maintain the constitutional security of the property and the other affecting the fair and reasonable rate which should be allowed in order to encourage the investment of capital in railway operation—is the conspicuous feature of the measure passed by this body, and for that reason the Hepburn bill, in my judgment, approaches very closely perfection of legislative work. And, sir, because this feature of the Hepburn bill is its strongest title to popular approval it is the point at which all the covert enemies of any effective measure for the regulation of railway rates direct the full fury of their assaults. Openly professing an eager desire for a liberal court review, they disguise under that mellifluous phrase a demand that every order of the Commission be made subject in all its aspects and features to judicial sanction, in the hope that such a provision will be interpreted as empowering the judges to decide the political as well as the judicial question involved—to fix the fair and reasonable rate which, as matter of policy, a railway should be permitted to earn that the investment of capital in such enterprises may be encouraged, as well as the fair and reasonable rate which as matter of constitutional right it must be left free to earn. Under cover of a pretense that they are deeply concerned about the independence of the judiciary, these gentlemen strive to undermine it by endeavoring to project its authority over matters of policy with which it is wholly unfitted to deal. Any attempt by judges to exercise powers purely political is necessarily foredoomed to failure, while the discredit which must follow inevitably would be a fatal injury to the credit of the courts, and therefore a serious blow to their independence, entailing serious peril to our whole constitutional system.

The Hepburn bill does not seek either to extend or restrict the judicial power. It assumes the Constitution to be the most perfect fruit ever borne by human capacity, and it believes the excellence of the Constitution is nowhere so conspicuous as in its establishment of an independent judiciary. It leaves the courts unchecked authority over all the field where their power can be exercised with credit to themselves and profit to the people. It reserves to Congress full control over matters of policy which belong properly and exclusively to the field of legislation.

Not only is this the boundary fixed by the Constitution between judicial and legislative functions; it is the true line which must always separate them by every principle of sound government.

Conceive for a moment the essential functions of a court.

A court must declare and establish the law, constitutional or statute. The law to be law must be fixed, certain, and definite. The courts therefore can have no power to relax, change, or modify it. The legislature, on the other hand, is created expressly to prescribe new enactments or relax existing statutory provisions, as it may think will serve the public weal. The function of the courts is to ascertain what the law is and then declare it; the function of the legislature is to ascertain what the law ought to be and then enact it. The one thing which a court can never consider is policy. And policy is the one thing the legislature is bound always to consider. The court must declare the law, whatever consequences the judges may apprehend from their decision. If I should step into the Supreme Court and tell the nine judges there assembled that if they declared the law to have a certain significance on all sides men would spring to arms and resist the interpretation; if I could satisfy them that the announcement of a conclusion honestly reached would provoke rebellion—aye, revolution—causing the stones to be taken from the street and hurled against their own chamber; if they felt convinced that the very foundations of this Capitol would rock under the popular indignation which their decision would awaken, still if they be faithful to their oaths they must not hesitate. Even though their conception of the law work disturbance and devastation they must none the less declare it; even though to pronounce a judgment which they believe the law enjoins should entail serious risk to their own lives they must sacrifice the safety of their bodies to the safety of the law. [Applause.]

In declaring the law no discretion is open to them. The discretion sometimes given the judges in dealing with individuals—especially in imposing penalties on offenders against the State—they can never exercise when interpreting the law under which they act. To them the law is master; they its priests and servants. They ascertain it but to obey it, to enforce its provisions, to voice its spirit. The constitutional security of property is fixed beyond the power of any statute to disturb. The court can not suffer it to be invaded by us or by any power on earth, on grounds of policy or on any pretense whatever. Though I should give the judges a thousand reasons of policy for depriving capital invested in railways of profit or for reducing its profits below what money can earn in any other field of industry, they would be bound to ignore my suggestion and set aside a law which impaired in any degree the full constitutional security of this property. They must always and everywhere declare the Constitution, not perhaps as they would have framed it or as they might like to make it if they had the power to change it, but as they find it—as it is—as the framers made it. [Applause.]

But the legislature being required to deal with all matters of policy, it is therefore preeminently a field for the exercise of discretion. Instead of ignoring considerations of policy we should be governed by them. While it remains a policy of the country to invite the employment of capital in the operation of public franchises, the legislature must fix the conditions by which owners of capital may be induced to engage in this form of service. We have the right to say that its profits should be 6 per cent to-day, and to-morrow we might make it 10 per cent, and a week hence 12 per cent, according as the rates of interest for money and the requirements of public convenience affected our judgment. This field of policy being exclusively ours, if we invited the judges to enter it, I am sure they would refuse, and if we atempted to invade the field of judicial authority, they would repel us as we would deserve to be repulsed. The Hepburn bill recognizes these separate spheres, by leaving to the judiciary power to decide what is the reasonable rate necessary to maintain the constitutional security of property while it reserves to Congress power to fix the fair and reasonable rate necessary to encourage the investment of capital in railway operation. [Applause.]

The ingenuity of legislative constitutional lawyers may invent grounds to criticise this measure, but any court responsible to the people, of whose Constitution it is the depository, and governed by the oath of its members will hold that not one word in it conflicts with the fundamental law which is the pact and covenant binding all these States together in indissoluble union and perfect harmony for the establishment of justice.

Mr. Chairman, this measure has been the product of free discussion. The Philippine tariff bill is another evidence of what this House can do when left free to be governed by the patriotism and the abilities of its own membership. On the other hand, the statehood bill, contemptuously rejected by the Senate, and on which this House, I am sure, will not venture to insist, is a striking evidence of the incapacity to which we can sink when the native ability, honesty, and patriotism of our membership are hampered by degrading restrictions imposed on us by the Committee on Rules.

And, sir, as this bill is a proof of what we have done under free discussion, so it is an indication of what this House can always do under similar conditions. Surely no more imposing monument to its ability has been raised by any legislative body in modern times than the fact that every rogue whom this law is intended to control denounces us, while the vast body of the people show their approval of us by absence of genuine criticism. The newspapers owned or inspired by the criminals who have made this legislation necessary affect to deride us, to say we have not properly considered this bill, to pretend that amendments were not even considered while it was here under discussion. And all this, too, in face of the record that at every stage amendments were offered and debated—that not one which any gentleman proposed was refused consideration and on every one a vote was taken. The fact that no amendments were adopted is proof not of undue haste or indifference on the part of the House, but of the care with which the measure was considered and the skill with which it was drawn. I believe it has been the experience of almost every man upon this floor who may have thought the bill could have been improved in some particular that when he undertook to formulate an amendment in every instance he found the foresight of the committee had anticipated his criticism. Certainly that was my own experience, and I believe the experience of others was similar to mine.

Sir, I hope this House, which was not awed by the specter of socialism when it was invoked upon this floor to terrify us, whose members could not be divided on old party lines by any ancient phrases about danger to the Constitution from equipping the Federal Government with power to enforce the rights of every citizen to equal treatment by corporations engaged in interstate commerce, will remain to the last one united body in defense of this, the best product of Congressional deliberation. I fervently trust, sir, we will be unanimous in refusing to accept the slightest change or modification of its essential features or of its fundamental principle. [Applause.] That fundamental principle is the right of government to control and regulate railways for the twofold purpose of exacting efficient service for the people, and providing absolute security for the property by which the service is rendered. The essential feature of the bill is its recognition of the true line separating judicial from legislative powers—its acknowledgment that what constitutes the fair and reasonable rate necessary to maintain the constitutional security of property invested in railways is a question for the courts, while the fair and reasonable rate to encourage the investment of capital in such enterprises is essentially a question of policy to be decided by the political department of government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, by standing for this bill as it passed the House, even if it should result in the failure of all rate legislation this session, we will go before the people, not as enemies of the judges or the courts, but as their champion and their bulwark. When was a fouler imputation ever cast upon an upright body, when was a darker reproach ever leveled against the judiciary than this anxiety on the part of criminals, who have finally driven the General Government to adopt measures for their regulation that the judges should be clothed with the power not to interpret, but to administer this disciplinary statute.

Is this not an insinuation that these rogues believe the courts of law far from being dreadful precincts where justice must overtake them, are a sanctuary where they would be safe from the pursuit of justice? We, sir, believe the courts within their proper sphere of authority can exercise no power but what is wholesome. Standing by this bill as it left this Chamber, whatever the immediate consequences, we can afford to ask judgment by the people on our critics and ourselves. The issue is not obscure or perplexing. It is simple. It is obvious. All recognize the existence of stupendous wrongs. For these undoubted wrongs we offer the people a remedy. Our opponents offer them a lawsuit. Let the people choose between us.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped when I took the floor to point out how the rules of this House might easily be amended, so that results such as have been achieved in the passage of this bill and the Philippine tariff bill would not be exceptional but invariable fruits of our labors. But, sir, the time allotted to me is well-nigh exhausted. It would not be practicable now to discuss the matter fully, and partial or incomplete discussion tends to confusion of thought rather than conclusions of value. On some future occasion, when I shall not have already occupied the House at such length—though with a subject which, judging from the attention I have received, is evidently one of sufficient interest to justify the time devoted to its discussion—I shall endeavor to show how the rules as they stand operate to prevent legislative efficiency and to promote legislative incapacity. At this moment I can do no more than point out that we are no longer governed by a majority; we are not even able to ascertain the existence of a majority on any occasion or any subject.

Several questions of tremendous importance have been raised during the debate by Members on that side and on this side, yet no means exist by which the opinions of the House can be taken on any one of them. If the judgment of the House could be taken on the propositions formulated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] on the floor and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] in his correspondence with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE], there is strong reason to believe that an overwhelming majority would favor immediate action. But on these questions we are gagged, silenced, reduced to absolute, almost ludicrous, impotence. We are ruled, not by a majority—so far as I am concerned I have never questioned the right of a majority to rule—but by three men, a minority so pitiful in numbers, though respectable in character, that it is a parody on legislative proceedings to find the whole House absolutely helpless under their despotic power.

As we have stood together on this rate measure with triumphant results, I am sure if we approach this question of rules in the same nonpartisan spirit the fruits will be equally valuable.

Mr. Chairman, you and I and the different political parties with which we are identified will be contending in a few days for control of this House. You expect to retain the present majority; we hope to reverse it. In the strife that is before us I hope to deliver a few blows. I anticipate much sturdier strokes in return; but whatever the outcome may be, whichever side shall achieve control of this body, I think we should be unanimous now in a determination to make that control a prize worth winning. [Loud applause.]

Speaking, I believe, for an overwhelming majority of this side, we would much rather that the gentleman who will certainly be called to adorn the Speaker's chair if the complexion of the House should change [loud applause]—we would prefer that he preside over an independent, powerful, intelligent House, as I am sure he himself would rather be the servant—the voice—the hands of such a House—than be the despot, the czar, the boss of an impotent, incapable, servile House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking for a party here—I appeal to both sides. This House, by the measure which I have been discussing, has shown that it is still abundantly capable of becoming the chief ornament of this Government, as the framers of our constitutional system intended it should be. It would be idle to deny that its importance has dwindled and that its consequence has been eclipsed. May we not hope the best lesson of this rate bill will be a unanimous conclusion that we have but to make the free discussion, by which this surprising success was achieved, a permanent feature of our procedure to restore our credit, regain our power, increase our consequence—to make this House the great and dominating factor of our constitutional system, the rampart of democratic institutions, the glory of representative government and of deliberative bodies here and everywhere throughout the world? [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment for information.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an additional amendment, to follow the amendment just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following: "Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations in such manner as he may think advisable without advertising therefor."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $900,000, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts not exceeding, in the aggregate, $1,161,265.84, under the provisions of the law, for a period not exceeding ten years, and with the right of termination at the discretion of the Postmaster-General of any such contract at the end of any year of the contract term after four years, on one year's notice: Provided, That said service shall not be extended in any cities other than those in which the service is now under contract under authority of Congress, except the cities of Brooklyn, Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Pittsburg.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this item covers the provision asked for New York.

Mr. OVERSTREET. This item covers entirely the recommendation with respect to New York, with respect to Chicago, with respect to Cincinnati, and other cities.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I move to strike out the last word. For what new territory is this service to be given?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The territory to which the service is proposed to be extended is Cincinanti, Kansas City, and Pittsburg. We simply put in Brooklyn as a precautionary measure. Brooklyn has been absorbed into greater New York and is included in New York, but we simply designate Brooklyn for fear it might be held not to be included in the cities in which the service is now under contract.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there any question of utility in extending this service? I suppose this service is extended to Cincinnati, Pittsburg, and Kansas City?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think there is a decided advantage to the Government in the extension of this service wherever congestion of business on the streets by reason of street traffic and where the topography of the territory is such as to make it decidedly unfavorable to wagon service; there is a very decided advantage to the Government, in my judgment, in all of this service. For example, this last summer, during the strike of the drivers of the mail wagons in the city of New York, the tube service was practically the only service upon which the Department relied for a number of days.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does it save anything in the way of expense?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am inclined to think that, on the whole, it is an increased expense, but it is one of those facilities that you can scarcely measure in dollars and cents. If you should add enough individuals to carry the mails by wagons or other devices of a similar character with the same expedition with which this service carries the mail, the expense of that would be much heavier than this expense; but it is a decided saving in the rapidity of the delivery of the mail to the office from the railway stations and from the substations within those cities.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I was prompted to make these inquiries from the understanding I had that the bill carries a larger appropriation than the estimate.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; it is a less appropriation than the estimate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understood it to be larger; but if the service is practicable and feasible, why of course nobody should have any objection to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is decidedly practicable and feasible and important.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is no longer a city of Brooklyn, and I suggest that an amendment be offered so as to make the bill read, "Borough of Brooklyn, of the city of New York, and the cities of Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Pittsburg." Some technical gentleman in the Treasury Department may raise a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is a post-office in Brooklyn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; there is a post-office.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And I dislike to substitute "borough" for "city."

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no city of Brooklyn.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Technically speaking, I suppose the gentleman is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Brooklyn is a borough of the city of New York. It is one of the five boroughs.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is possible that it would not be necessary to include the word "Brooklyn" at all. It might be included in those cities where the service is already in operation. We only put the word in as a safeguard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language of the provision is that said service shall not be extended in any cities except certain ones.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The proviso is that this service shall not be extended to any cities other than those where the service is now in operation. The service is not in operation at Brooklyn, excepting as a part——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is in operation at Brooklyn.

Mr. OVERSTREET. As a part of New York. It is a part of New York for that purpose. The gentleman's suggestion is to amend it by making it read "the Borough of Brooklyn?"

Mr. FITZGERALD. "Borough of Brooklyn, of the city of New York, and the cities of Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Pittsburg."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the word "city," in line 8, and insert "Borough;" and add, after "Brooklyn," the words "of the city of New York and the cities of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so as to read: "Borough of Brooklyn, of the city of New York, and the cities of Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Pittsburg."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I accept that amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I failed to hear the amendment read, and I desire to ask that it be read again. I heard the words "Borough of Brooklyn" mentioned, and I desire to know whether the Borough of Manhattan is also included.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill now specifically excludes the city of Brooklyn. We simply wish to designate it properly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The city of Brooklyn has been wiped out. It is the Borough of Brooklyn, in the city of New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what this amendment is intended to state.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] that under that amendment and the provision of the bill it will cover all of Greater New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It will all be included?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $43,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting between lines 23 and 24 on page 16 the following: "Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1906, for transportation of mails on the railroad routes hereinafter described as hereinafter provided: On railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day exceeding 50,000 pounds by reducing the compensation now allowed by law on such routes 5 per cent per annum, and on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day exceeding 100,000 pounds by reducing the compensation now allowed by law on such routes 10 per cent per annum, and on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day exceeding 150,000 pounds by reducing the compensation now allowed by law on such routes 15 per cent per annum, and on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day exceeding 200,000 pounds by reducing the compensation now allowed by law on such routes 20 per cent per annum.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this amendment I will say that it carries out the views that I expressed in my remarks the other day. It provides for a progressive reduction of the railway mail pay on roads where the traffic is dense, so that where they carry the average amount of 50,000 pounds per day over the whole route the reduction is 5 per cent of the present rates; where they carry 100,000 pounds per day over the whole route it is 10 per cent; where they carry 150,000 pounds it is 15 per cent, and exceeding 200,000 pounds it is 20 per cent, or one-fifth.

This I believe to be a very reasonable reduction, and it will leave the lowest rate about 4½ cents per ton a mile, or more than five times the average rate for freight.

As will be remembered, I pointed out that the mails on these heavy routes are carried in special trains, a part of which is in storage cars carrying loads of more than 45,000 pounds. That was also pointed out in the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I believe that this amendment will effect a fair adjustment, and it will not affect any railroads where the tonnage is less than 50,000 pounds per day. I hope that no point of order will be made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to discuss this point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order, but I understand the gentleman from Georgia wishes to be recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], providing for a graduated reduction of railway mail pay, and shall be very glad, indeed, to support it, if I have the opportunity to do so. I realize, however, that the point of order urged against it by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], that it changes existing law, is good, and I do not suppose that the committee will be permitted to vote upon it, for I assume that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] will insist upon the point of order, and thus prevent the committee from voting on the merits of this proposition. Permit me to remark in passing that this incident serves to again call the sharp attention of the House and of the country to the unfair and unequal way in which this "point of order" business is worked in this House. No matter how meritorious a proposition is, no matter how good the change of existing law may be, if suggested by some Member of this House, the point of order is inexorably made, and is insisted upon. On the other hand, if the committee wishes to change not only one but scores or even hundreds of existing laws, all is well, and it is considered the height of impropriety, almost official misconduct, for any ordinary Member to enforce the rule. Indeed, if any Member should prove stubborn and insist upon the committee's complying with the rule, I have heard of an instance, not so long ago, when the poor, bewildered committee, amazed at such unexpected conduct, rushed to the all-powerful Committee on Rules with the old Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us, or we die!

But, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the subject upon which I desired to address the committee. On last Friday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] addressed the committee in support of the item carrying an increased appropriation for railway mail pay. I am unwilling that the gentleman's argument shall go unchallenged either before this House or before the country. In his opening remarks the gentleman used these words:

Inasmuch as the total compensation for railway mail pay, including cars, is about $45,000,000.

Now, he is not accurate in his statement as to the amount appropriated for railway mail pay in this bill. The appropriation in the pending bill is $43,000,000 for railway mail pay and $5,875,000 for cars, a total of $48,875,000, which is considerably nearer $49,000,000 than $45,000,000.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania states also that when all the facts are considered it is a great mistake to think that because the appropriation required to compensate the railroads for carrying the mail is large that it is necessarily too large. He also states that "in comparison with other features it is small." Then, taking the average percentage of increase for the last six years as his basis, he institutes a comparison between the item covering the railway mail pay and the general departmental expenditures and three specific items, selected by himself apparently without rhyme or reason.

Selecting the six-year average plan of comparision undoubtedly made his task a much easier one than it would otherwise have been, because the appropriation for railway mail pay carried in this bill for the fiscal year 1907 was 5 per cent greater than it had been for the fiscal year 1906, whereas the same appropriation was only 3 per cent greater for the fiscal year 1906 than it had been for the fiscal year 1905. In other words, the percentage of increase on this item is almost double what it was one year ago.

If he had taken the annual average increase of the total departmental expenditures for eleven years, as given in the report, instead of for six years, he would have found that the annual per cent of increase was 6.4, instead of 8.67, the annual per cent of increase for the last six years. Furthermore, the increase for the fiscal year 1907 carried in this bill is only 5.72 per cent, as against an increase of 5 per cent on the railway mail pay.

There are three specific items also with which he invokes a comparison of this item. Let us see what they are. First, the wagon-service item, carrying $1,227,000; second, the appropriation for postal clerks, carrying $15,000,000; third, the item for postage stamps, carrying $550,000. The total carried in these three items referred to by him is $16,700,000. It will be observed that the first and third of these items are comparatively insignificant ones, while the second item carries the salaries of men employed by the Government on postal cars. Now, let me "select," just as my friend from Pennsylvania has done, four items for the purpose of comparing them with this item of railway mail pay, and I will not select insignificant items or pick them at random, but will at least try to select the largest and most important items carried in this bill.

First. Compensation to postmasters, $24,000,000; an increase for the fiscal year 1907 of 1 per cent over the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1906, as against 5 per cent increase in the railway mail pay.

Second. Pay of letter carriers (city), $22,280,000; an increase for the fiscal year 1907 of 4.3 per cent over the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1906, as against 5 per cent increase during the same period in railway mail pay.

Third. For inland transportation by star routes, $7,100,000; an increase for the fiscal year 1907 of 2.7 per cent over the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1906, as against 5 per cent increase during the same period in the railway mail pay.

Fourth. For rural free delivery $28,200,000, an increase of 12 per cent over the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1906. But we must remember that the rural free-delivery system is comparatively new, is still growing, is still unperfected, and that this appropriation is not only for maintenance and the regular normal growth of a branch of the service already firmly established, as is the case in every other item referred to both by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, but also includes the expense of extending, enlarging, and perfecting a branch of the service still growing and still undeveloped.

For the fiscal year 1903 we appropriated for rural delivery $7,000,000; for the fiscal year 1904, $12,000,000, an increase of 71.25 per cent; for the fiscal year 1905, $20,180,000, an increase of 66 per cent; for the fiscal year 1906, $25,120,000, an increase of 25 per cent, or while, as I have already stated, the pending bill carries, for the fiscal year 1907, $28,200,000, an increase of 12 per cent. But it must be remembered that the percentage of increase in railway mail pay was almost doubled in the pending bill over the percentage of increase carried in the last post-office bill, and at the same time the percentage of increase in the rural-delivery appropriations has been cut almost half in two.

Mr. LLOYD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. With pleasure; for a question.

Mr. LLOYD. Are you aware of the fact that the committee gave the rural free-delivery service more than was asked for by the Department?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. Are you aware of the fact that there will be, according to the present indications, quite a surplus in the Treasury as a result of the appropriations for last year that will not be expended, by nearly a million, and perhaps of that amount——

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] will pardon me, I know; but as my time is limited, I can not yield for more than a question. The gentleman will, I hope, understand that I am not attacking the committee as unfriendly to rural free delivery. I do complain somewhat of the Department on that score. I think the effort is being made by the Department to make up a large part of the deficit in the Post-Office Department at the expense of the rural free-delivery service by making their rules more stringent about the establishment of routes and enforcing those rules more harshly, and thus preventing the greater growth of the system so beneficial to the farmers of the country. I know the committee has recommended more for this service than the Department requested, but I don't think the committee has recommended as much as we ought to have.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the gentleman in error when he computes his percentages on the increased yearly appropriations? And should he not consider not the percentages, but the aggregate amount that has been appropriated each year for increased service? A few years ago we only appropriated $7,000,000 for the rural service. When that was increased by $5,000,000 the per cent of increase should be based on the $7,000,000. This year we are appropriating just as much for additional rural mail service as we did last year, though the percentage when it is compared with the increased appropriation of last year will be less.

Mr. HARDWICK. In one sense, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is undoubtedly correct about that. But while you may have appropriated as much more money this year over last than you appropriated last year over the year before, yet the rate of comparative increase is, of course, not the same. I am, however, using precentages in this instance, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] used them, and I am endeavoring to reply to his argument.

The three specific items selected for comparison by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] carry a total of $16,770,000. The four items selected by me for comparison carry a total of $81,580,000, or excluding, if you prefer, the item of rural free delivery, the three remaining items selected by me carry a total of $53,380,000.

I am perfectly willing to submit it to the judgment of this House and of this country as to whether my comparison or his has been the fairest, and has afforded a more accurate view, from the comparative basis, of the increased appropriation for railway mail pay.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that the only large item selected by him for comparison, namely, $15,000,000 for the pay of postal clerks, and all of the items referred to by me are items that carry the salaries of thousands of men employed by the Government in the various branches of the post-office service. Now, of course, with the gradual growth of the service, the Government must necessarily employ a larger force of men to transact the business, but it is not true that because the Government must hire more men that it can save anything by paying to these men smaller salaries. The Government does not get, nor is it entitled to, any deduction of this kind. On the other hand, "it is a fundamental rule of transportation that the cost per unit of transportation decreases as the density of the traffic increases." The increase in cost of transportation of mails ought not, under any just and fair system of compensation, to increase with the growth of business in any ratio or percentage that is anything like as high or as great as the increase in total salaries paid to the increased force of employees, and yet a study of this question is bound to convince any unprejudiced mind that the cost of transporting the mails by rail increases in even greater ratio than the salaries of the employees who handle that mail.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to attempt an answer to the second proposition laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in support of his position that the railway mail pay is not excessive, is even moderate when compared with other items in the bill. The gentleman insists that he has been convinced by the report of the Wolcott Commission, made to Congress in 1901, that the present rate paid the railroads for transporting the mails is not excessive. I do not believe that the gentleman could have made a more unhappy or more unfortunate reference. There were eight members of this Commission—four from the Senate and four from the House. After eighteen months' work they undertook to report to the Congress the result of their investigations and labors, and found it impossible to agree on any one report that more than two of the Commission would sign. Four of its members, Messrs. Wolcott, ALLISON, MARTIN, and Loud did agree that in their judgment the present rate of railway mail pay was not excessive, but one of these, and probably the most experienced and industrious of them all in this particular line of legislation, Mr. Loud, earnestly recommended and insisted that the present system of paying for the transportation of the mails was fundamentally wrong—that we ought to pay by space and not by weight—and he earnestly protested that there had been no proper inquiry along that line.

While Mr. Moody, the present able Attorney-General, did agree that the present rate of pay to the railroads for carrying the mails was not grossly excessive, he would not state that it was not excessive at all, and recommended still further investigation. Mr. Catchings agreed with Mr. Moody in this view. Professor Adams, the expert employed by the Commission, recommended a flat reduction of 5 per cent on all rates, and a still further graduated reduction on all railroads receiving in excess of 20 cents per ton per mile for carrying mail. His recommendations were concurred in by Messrs. Chandler and Flemming, the latter gentleman filing a very elaborate and able report in support of his views on this question.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] can regard anything as "settled" from this report, or from these several reports, and if he can get anything final and conclusive out of this divergence of "views" and varieties of "opinions," he must indeed be possessed of "exceeding great faith."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] quotes from the evidence delivered before the Wolcott Commission by Henry S. Julier, general manager of the Adams Express Company, and by Samuel Spencer, president of the Southern Railway, to show that the railroads receive less pay from the Government for transporting the mails than they do from the express companies for transporting the express.

The gentleman does not undertake, of course, to give all the testimony of these witnesses, but merely gives a summary of that evidence, which summary was, I understand, compiled by Mr. W. W. Baldwin, of the Burlington route. I contend that this "summary" of Mr. Baldwin's is inaccurate, incorrect, and liable to be misleading. In the first place neither of the witnesses uses the exact language imputed to him by Mr. Baldwin, and while the summary is in the main correct, it is incorrect and incomplete in that it does not undertake to state the qualifications put by the witnesses themselves upon their own evidence, or to give the basis upon which they figure in order to arrive at the results stated by Mr. Baldwin and quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. For instance, in order to make his comparison between mail and express rates Mr. Julier insisted upon adding to the actual amount paid by the express company to the railroad the sum of $242,000, which he claimed was compensation for the "services of men used jointly with the railroad companies, rental of rooms at depots, etc."

On the other hand, before he would make the comparison between mail and express rates, Mr. Spencer insisted on subtracting from the amount actually received by the railroad for transporting the mail "a portion of the total mail pay, which may be properly considered as received for hauling post-office employees, for supplying and hauling post-office cars, for carrying the mails between stations and post-offices, and for special fast train service."

Neither of these witnesses, pursuing the exactly opposite course of figuring, the one adding to the amount actually paid by the express companies, and the other subtracting from the amount actually paid by the Government, undertook to give the Commission, so far as I have been able to discover, any definite, precise, and detailed information as to the amounts added in the one case and subtracted in the other, and there is strong reason to believe that neither system of "figuring" is wholly accurate and entirely fair.

I know full well that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], who is a gentleman of the very highest character, beloved and respected by every Member of this House, would not intentionally mislead the House by either an inaccurate or a partial quotation, and I have no reason to believe that Mr. Baldwin, from whose paper on the comparison of express and mail rates these "quotations" were taken, would intentionally mislead anyone, but I submit that if the statements are allowed to go in the record unchallenged they would be calculated to mislead, however innocent of intention to do so my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] or Mr. Baldwin might be.

Again, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] puts in his speech a brief extract from the report of Mr. Moody as a member of the Wolcott Commission. The concluding paragraph quoted from Mr. Moody by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is as follows:

> Beginning with 1880 (the first year in which all the statistics were available for comparison) passenger rates have decreased 21 per cent, freight rates 44 per cent, and mail rates 39 per cent.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania then triumphantly exclaims:

> Now, unless some one can answer that argument of Mr. Moody's, there is nothing in the contention that the rate must be excessive because the law has stood for so many years.

Mr. Chairman, I will undertake to "answer the argument of Mr. Moody's" by quoting the very next sentence of Mr. Moody's own report:

> This would seem satisfactory were it not for the facts that during the same period the passenger mileage of passengers increased 233 per cent, the ton mileage of freight 353 per cent, and the ton mileage of mail 579 per cent, and that there had resulted large concentrations of mail on certain routes.

I am inclined to partially agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he asserts that the public has very little accurate information on the subject, and that there is no such amount of excessive pay as is generally believed by the public; still I firmly believe that the pay is, to some extent, generally excessive, and in some instances, because of the large concentration of mail, grossly so. I think Congress ought to follow the advice of the able expert employed by its last Commission, who brought to a laborious and painstaking investigation of this subject, extended through many months, a splendidly trained and thoroughly impartial mind. If the advice of this expert, Professor Adams, were accepted, the law would be so amended as to provide for a general reduction of 5 per cent in railway mail pay, and a still further graduated reduction on all routes receiving more than 20 cents per ton per mile. (See report of Professor Adams, Part II of the testimony, page 171.)

That this recommendation has gone absolutely unconsidered by this House during the long period of more than five years that has elapsed since that report was received by it, is but another of the numerous sins of omission for which the party in power must finally answer to the American people. The report of the Postmaster-General, made to this Congress at the beginning of the present session, clearly states that that officer is not entirely satisfied with the present status of the pay received by the railroads for transporting the mails. On page 66 of his report he uses these words:

> The law relative to rates of payment for railroad mail transportation has not been changed since 1873, except as it has been modified by the laws of 1876 and 1878, by which a reduction in the rates of 10 and 5 per cent, respectively, was made.
> The present method of determining the rates of pay for this service is not altogether satisfactory; and while I am not yet prepared to suggest specific changes, it is believed that certain inquiries that are being instituted through departmental channels will afford data on which to base future recommendations.
> The plan now followed appears to furnish a somewhat uncertain basis upon which to make annual expenditures exceeding $40,000,000.

In opening the debate on the pending bill, on April 5, 1906, one of the most able and upright members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] made this statement to the House:

> One of the most important questions, in my judgment, for the consideration of this House is the question of railway mail pay. From year to year there is an increase in the pay demanded by the railroad companies of the United States for transportation of mails. Gradually there is an increase in appropriations. It must be conceded that the growing business of the country and the population of the country contribute largely to this demand, and its accessions on the part of Congress to the railroad companies of the United States, but this committee has never had the information; it has not now the information; the Government of the United States has not the information, and no man within the sound of my voice has information with which to act intelligently and pass an opinion as to what the proper and just pay ought to be to the railroad companies for the transportation of mails. I venture the assertion that there is not a member of the committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House, or in the Senate, who can come within $10,000,000 to-day, from any proper basis of calculation, as to what legitimately ought to be paid to the railroad companies of the United States for this service.

What striking language to be used by a veteran legislator, an experienced, industrious, and able member of the committee, and the ranking Democrat of the committee, and yet no gentleman on either side of this House, except the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] has taken up the challenge or gainsaid the statement.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned I am not satisfied that the present rates of railway mail pay are right. I think that we ought at once to follow the recommendation of our own expert, Mr. Adams, and then we ought to institute a thorough and comprehensive examination into the whole question, so as to determine exactly what is the proper system of paying the railroads for the transportation of the mails, and just how much they ought to be paid in order to allow them a reasonable and just, but not an excessive, compensation for this service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order. The amendment is clearly contrary to existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out the words "forty-three million dollars," in lines 22 and 23, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "forty million dollars: Provided, That before said sum shall be expended the Postmaster-General shall, and he is hereby authorized to, readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1906, for transportation of mails on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day exceeding 50,000 pounds, by reducing the compensation now allowed by law on such routes 20 per cent per annum."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire the gentleman to reserve his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that this is substantially the same amendment as I offered a moment ago, except it makes a reduction of 20 per cent on the rates where the density of the mails is not exceeding 50,000 pounds per day. It is drawn in a straight way where this is to be paid. I desire to say that I have examined the laws of 1876 and 1878, reducing the amount of railway mail pay 10 per cent and 5 per cent, respectively, and I find that they were riders on appropriation bills the same as this provision; and it seems to me that the Chairman ought to distinguish this proposed amendment, because it simply amounts to a limitation upon the appropriation, and therefore is not subject to the point of order.

I believe it is the consensus of opinion of this House that the railway mail pay ought to be reduced. The Postmaster-General has suggested it, as shown by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and I believe this is a reasonable reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MACON. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I notice in the list of expenditures that you mention in detail in your report the first one is, "Transportation of mails on railroads, $39,384,916.17." And here in this provision that we are just passing it provides:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $43,000,000.

What is the reason for that discrepancy between the report and the bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, under the law rates are fixed for the pay of railroads for carrying the mails. Those rates are determined by the weight of the mail and the distance carried. For the convenience of ascertaining this information as a basis for the calculation of the amount of the appropriation, the entire country is divided into four divisions, and in each one of those separate territorial divisions the mail is weighed once in four years for a limited period, and the calculation of the entire weight of that section is made on that basis. Then the appropriation is carried uniformly for four years for that division. The expense on the four divisions at the close of the last fiscal year is the amount to which the gentleman has just made reference, stated in the report of the committee; but during the present spring a new weighing period occurs in the western division, which includes all of the States and Territories west of the Mississippi, excepting, as I remember, three States not included.

The experience of the Government shows that by reason of the increased volume of business the increased weight of the mail since the preceding weighing of four years ago in that section will be from 15 to 17 per cent. Hence we have taken the annual rate on the 30th day of last June for each of three remaining divisions and added to the annual rate for the western division 15 per cent of that amount. Therefore we increase the total by the difference between what the law carries for the current year and the amount in this item.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to strike out "forty-three" and to insert "forty" in lieu thereof.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, that would not affect the right of payment nor the claim for payment. It would merely delay it. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Upon reflection, as the pay is fixed by law, the amendment might just as well be withdrawn. I should like to reduce the rate of pay, but we must, of course, pay the railroads what the law provides.

The question being taken on Mr. HARDWICK's amendment, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Postmaster-General shall require a record from July 1 to December 31, 1906, of all second-class mail matter received for free distribution, and also at the 1 cent a pound rate, so as to show the weights in pounds, respectively, by classes, of daily newspapers, weekly and other than daily newspapers, magazines, scientific periodicals, educational periodicals, religious periodicals, trade-journal periodicals, agricultural periodicals, miscellaneous periodicals, and sample copies of said newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, and make report to Congress of such information by February 1, 1907, together with an estimate of the average length of haul of said respective classes above named.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert at page 17, line 24, end of line:

"And in the meantime, and until said report is made, whenever any person or corporation shall apply to the Postmaster-General for the admission of any newspaper or publication to the mails at the second-class rate, and such application shall be denied or refused, such person or corporation shall have the right, and is hereby empowered, to apply for a writ of mandamus to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or to the justices or any justice thereof; and the proceedings therein shall be had and governed as is provided for in the issuing, granting, and trial of such writs of mandamus in chapter 42 of the Laws of the District of Columbia, enacted March 3, 1901, and as amended by acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, and embraced in sections 1273 to 1282, inclusive, of said Code of the District of Columbia; and if upon the trial and hearing of said application for writ of mandamus it shall be decided by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or the justices or any justice thereof, that such newspaper or publication is, under the law governing the admission of newspapers and publications to the mails as second-class matter, entitled to such admission, then it shall be the duty of said court, or said justices or any justice thereof, to issue the writ of mandamus directed to the Postmaster-General, requiring him to admit such newspaper or publication to the mails as second-class matter; the costs in such proceeding to be paid by the person or corporation making application for the mandamus."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am much obliged to the gentleman for reserving the point of order instead of making it, but I wish to state that in my opinion the amendment is not subject to a point of order. I had just as well argue the point of order now. I understand the gentleman to reserve it, but I will argue it as if it were made.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will make the point instead of reserving it, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I will argue the point of order, because I am prepared to do that; and after arguing the point of order I wish to say something with reference to the merits of the amendment itself.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would prefer that the gentleman confine his remarks to the merits of the amendment, for the five minutes. Then let us dispose of the point of order afterwards.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I will argue the merits, but I do not wish to be understood as conceding that the point of order is good, because I think that the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If I understand the gentleman, he wants to make two speeches—one on the point of order and one on the merits of the amendment. Is that right?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; if you please.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman's remarks be along the same line of argument as he addressed to the committee the other day?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I am not following the example of some of my good friends and repeating a good thing. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the point of order I discuss first is this: I apprehend that a point of order to be good must be that the amendment changes existing law or that it is new legislation. The provision in the bill itself, commencing with line 12 on page 17, down to line 2 on page 18, is new legislation, and admittedly so. There is no question about it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me, the hour is growing late, and it is needless for us to debate about this proposition. The provision of the bill to which the gentleman refers is undoubtedly subject to a point of order if the gentleman wishes to make it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not made it; I shall not make it; but I have offered an amendment to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not accept, as free from the point of order, the statute which the gentleman proposes to engraft upon this provision. I think there is no Member of this body but approves of the provision in this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do approve of it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But if the gentleman is going to make a point of order on this item in the bill, then I will concede that it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. But I am not going to make it

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not waive the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not asked the gentleman to waive it. I do not think it is subject to the point of order. And I also think, in justice to the people of the United States, in the interest of proper service in the Post-Office Department, in order to defeat a tyrannical and despotic rule that prevails in the Post-Office Department, the gentleman ought to waive the point. But, Mr. Chairman, I insist that the point of order is not good, and I started to say why I thought it was not good.

I desire to say that it has been admitted by the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee, that this is new legislation. The point of order has not been made against it, and therefore it remains in the bill. Now, any amendment, if it is germane to this proposition, is in order. I apprehend that I need not call the attention of the Chair, so experienced a parliamentarian and so accustomed to preside in Committee of the Whole, and whose decisions are so uniformly accepted as correct, to the proposition, but I will refer the Chair to page 324 of the Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question but that the gentleman from Georgia has correctly stated the proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Chairman, this being a new proposition ingrafted on this bill, a new law on the subject, the Chair will see that I have simply provided that pending this investigation and report these people shall have the right to appeal to the courts. Now, this section deals with the subject of second-class mail matter. The law upon the subject is that second-class matter shall be admitted to the mail on application to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, stating the number of bona fide subscribers and various other requirements, and that the paper thereupon shall be admitted at the cent-a-pound rate. It is information upon that subject that this provision undertakes to provide shall be obtained by the Postmaster-General. This amendment simply provides that in the meantime, and until that report is made, those persons who apply to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General to have newspapers or other publications admitted at the second-class rates, during the time under which this investigation is to be had—during the time in which the material for this report is to be got up, which is to be sent to Congress—that these persons designated—not everybody, it is not a general statute, but the people who make application during this period of time—shall have the right to appeal to the courts when they are denied access to the mails by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General; that they shall pay the cost of the proceedings in order to have the matter reviewed and determined.

Now, I grant you, Mr. Chairman, that if this amendment had been for the purpose of making a general statute, it might be—although I have some doubt about it—subject to a point of order; but I have made this amendment to comply with the purposes of the provisions incorporated in the bill by the committee. Therefore I think I have clearly brought myself within the rules that if the paragraph on the appropriation bill changes existing law, it may be perfected by a germane amendment which also changes existing law. That precise question was decided in the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, and may be found in the RECORD, page 1468, and there are numerous other cases upon that very point. It has been decided at the present session of Congress when the judicial, legislative, and executive appropriation bill was under consideration and new provisions were inserted in the bill changing existing law, creating new offices and new salaries, an amendment was offered, while the bill was being considered under a special rule made by the Committee on Rules, and although the amendment changed existing law, the Chairman, Mr. OLMSTED, ruled and held correctly, as the present occupant of the chair well knows, that an amendment to a provision of the bill which itself created a change of law was admissible.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the question reverts, Is this amendment germane to this section? The gentleman from Indiana did not make the point that it was not germane, but I propose to meet it. His proposition was that it was engrafting a statute on an appropriation bill. That is true, but the committee itself having first engrafted a new statute on an appropriation bill, if I can draw my amendment so that it is germane to the new provision that they have put in the bill, then I am permitted to do it under the rule.

It is germane, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to repeat what I have said. The purpose of the provision is that the Postmaster-General shall require a record of all second-class mail matter. It deals exclusively with second-class matter. It says newspapers, magazines, and periodicals. I have not used the exact language in the amendment used in the section, but, if it is necessary, I will change it so as to correspond in words. I used the words "newspapers or other publications." I apprehend that the words "newspapers and other publications" would include magazines, scientific periodicals, educational periodicals, religious periodicals, trade journals, etc. So while I have not in so many words and in detail set out in the proposed amendment each one of these publications that the gentleman from Indiana has set out in the section, I have the word "newspapers" and I have also the words "other publications," and these embrace all the subjects referred to in the section. Therefore this amendment of mine undertakes to deal only with the subject that the provisions of the bill deal with—that is, newspapers or any other publications. The other words of it are that any person who during this time, during the time from July 1, 1906, to December 31, 1906, who offers a publication or a magazine or a newspaper of the character described in this amendment for admission to the mails as second-class matter, if it is denied, if part of this information which Congress seeks to obtain by this provision is denied at the Post-Office Department, then that person who undertakes to enter his newspaper, his magazine, or periodical, or whatever it may be, may seek the courts in order to have Congress fully informed of all the second-class matter that ought to be in the mails and that is improperly excluded from the mails.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having said that much upon the matter of the point of order, and by the courtesy of my friend from Indiana, I will discuss the purpose of this amendment, and I shall do so briefly. Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I could fill the RECORD of this House—pages, at least—with complaints, with evidence, with facts, which show the absolute disregard of the law of the land by this department of the Post-Office in dealing with citizens who wish to have their publications admitted to the mails at the second-class rate. I say that we ought not to permit that to be done. I insist that it should not be the policy of this American Congress to sit silent and idle when there comes up from all over this broad land of ours loud and just complaints, supported by substantial and uncontradicted facts, that the law of the land is being administered in a despotic and tyrannical way in the Post-Office Department, by which the right to have access to the mails, for the carrying of which they contribute taxes, is denied. This is a land of law. Every man ought to be made obedient to it—the high Postmaster-General, the First-Assistant, the Second, or Third, as well as everyone else. To use the language of a great Chief Justice in the case of Marbury v. Madison, a case of note at the time rendered, and still is (to be found in 1 Cranch, U. S. Reports), a case in which the Chief Justice, John Marshall, declared that the right to the writ of mandamus existed in this country that could be enforced in a proper court of proper jurisdiction, even against the Secretary of State. I desire here now to repeat the words of that great Chief Justice.

> The Government of the United States has been emphatically termed a Government of laws and not of men. It would certainly cease to deserve this high appellation if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right. If this obloquy is to be cast upon the jurisprudence of our country, it must arise from the peculiar character of the case.

While I have on occasions heretofore called the attention of the House and of the country to peculiar facts in a certain case, I desire now to say that this amendment which I have offered, as I have a right to do, is not, in my opinion, obnoxious to any of the rules of the House. I have offered this amendment that for the time—at least, until Congress can be made to realize the wrongs that are perpetrated in the name of law by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General and those in his office against citizens of this country—something may be done for the relief of the people, and I present it, Mr. Chairman, feeling confident and convinced that in doing it at this place to amend this provision of the bill I do not violate any of the rules of the House or parliamentary bodies with reference to germaneness. The gentleman from Indiana and his committee, having seen fit to report to the House a bill providing for a change in existing law as to second-class matter in one material point, I call upon the House, I call upon the distinguished Member of the House now occupying the chair, unless it is so clearly violative of the rules of the House as to be overruled, I call upon him not to destroy the only opportunity that the people of the country will have at this Congress to remedy this great and crying wrong and to destroy this tyranny and despotism that exists in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman whether under the Constitution the Postmaster-General or the Third Assistant in either case is not subject now to a mandamus? Has any court ever held to the contrary?

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, I have a couple of cases in my hand, which I will not read, because I promised to be short, which indicates that it has not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Has there been a test case?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think there has, and one is reported in 194 United States. The Supreme Court say in that case that they will not overrule the discretion of the Postmaster-General in denying admission to the mails. They pretermit the question. I will not use the word "dodge" with reference to the Supreme Court, but they decided the case upon some other point. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in explanation of this, that the provision carried in this bill simply requires a report to Congress on the 1st of February next of a compilation of information which the Postmaster-General will then have made. Not a particle of second-class matter under the law can be accepted in the mail until it has been weighed and the postage paid. We simply require by this item that the record made of mail of these various classes of second-class matter shall be compiled in a record and a report made to Congress.

Now, the gentleman's amendment does change existing law. It changes existing law by requiring that the matter which has been excluded from the mail under existing law shall be received by the Government as second-class mail matter. The law relative to second-class mail is a statute which requires that certain things be done under which the Postmaster-General will accept it, provided these requirements have been fulfilled. If they have not been fulfilled, then the second-class privilege is denied. The gentleman's amendment obliges the Postmaster-General to accept this class of mail, even if under existing law it has been excluded. Therefore his amendment is subject to the point of order, both because it is not germane to this particular item of the bill and because his amendment does change existing law. Assuming, merely for the purpose of the argument, that the item contained in the bill would be subject to a point of order, which, I think, is not true, still that point has been waived.

Mr. BARTLETT. You admit that it was subject to the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think I made a mistake, upon reflection, and I always admit my mistakes when I think I have made them. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that possibly the item in the bill would be subject to a point of order, the point of order was waived when the amendment was offered and considered. Therefore, because this item of the bill simply calls for a record under existing law, this amendment would change existing law, because it would change the very statute under which such matter is accepted. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. One word in reply, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman has admitted that the provision was a change of existing law. If it is, then under my contention my amendment is in order. It is germane, and therefore in order. If it is not a change in existing law, then the amendment to existing law is also germane; but this provision is a change of existing law. There never was anything in any appropriation bill or any statute which required a report to Congress of the matters referred to in this section, or that this record be kept. For the first time the gentleman has inserted it in this appropriation bill and it has, since no point of order has been made against it, come before the House for consideration. Now he endeavors to get rid of the force and effect of that proposition by saying he was mistaken when he said it is new legislation. The gentleman, I apprehend, is not mistaken; it is new legislation. But if he take either horn of the dilemma he finds himself in, I am satisfied that this amendment is germane. It is of so much importance, is so just and proper, that I had hoped the gentleman would not insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether the provision in the bill as reported was in order or not, an amendment to it must be germane. But on the assumption that the provision was not in order, no point of order having been raised, of course it is in the bill. The question comes down to this point: An amendment thereto must first be germane; second, it must not add any new matter of legislation not contained in the provision the point of order upon which has not been raised.

Now, the provision in the bill provides for what? For a record of the transactions of the service and a report thereon to a future Congress. The amendment provides for a trial in a court and provides the machinery for relief where the complainants believe a wrong had been perpetrated; therefore it seems to the Chair——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the Chair permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the Chair will look at the words at the beginning of the amendment, he will see that it is provided that in the meantime, and until said report is made—thereby referring to the very provision of the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see that that changes the situation. The subject-matter of the provision is a record and a report. The subject-matter of the amendment is a writ of mandamus in case a wrong is perpetrated or is said to have been perpetrated.

But further than that, the amendment is obnoxious to the rule, which says that an amendment must be simply to perfect the text, and must not bring in some additional question of legislation. In the opinion of the Chair, this amendment is not germane, and it does propose to incorporate in the bill a new matter of legislation. Therefore the Chair is constrained to hold the amendment not in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 24, page 17, insert: "And in the meantime and until said report is made, when any person or corporation shall apply to the Postmaster-General for the admission of any newspaper or publication to the mails as second-class matter, and the same shall be denied admission to the mails as second-class matter, then such person or corporation shall have the right to an appeal to a board of appeals, hereby constituted and created for that purpose, to consist of the Postmaster-General, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who shall hear such appeal and the facts submitted by such person or corporation making the appeal, and if, in the opinion of such board of appeals so constituted as above stated, said newspaper or publication is entitled under the law to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, then such board of appeals shall so find and determine, and shall order said newspaper or publication to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment for the same reason that I did against the other.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not send the question to the court for adjudication at all. It simply puts it in the hands of the Postmaster-General and the First and Second Assistants, in order to determine what shall be done with the newspapers or other publications that are trying to be admitted to the mails at second-class rates in the intervening time and until this report is made. It is simply in addition to the scheme provided for in this section for carrying out the will of Congress; a means not by which the court, but by which the Post-Office Department itself undertakes to carry it out. The other amendment did not deal entirely with the Post-Office Department, but this amendment proposes to legislate in reference to certain duties and to impose certain requirements upon the Postmaster-General. Now, this provision itself says that the Postmaster-General shall require a record to be kept. This amendment simply requires that the Postmaster-General and the First and Second Assistant Postmasters-General shall also, in addition to what is required to be done, do certain additional things to carry out the will of Congress in order to make the record complete. It does not undertake to provide for an appeal to the courts, but simply deals with the duties and requirements of the Postmaster-General.

Now, the bill itself, in the paragraph beginning with line 12, page 17, makes provision that the Postmaster-General shall require certain things to be done. In addition to requiring those things to be done this amendment requires the Postmaster-General, aided by the First and Second Assistant Postmasters-General to do certain other things in carrying out the purpose of Congress. It seems to me that the distinction between the two amendments is clear, Mr. Chairman, and that this amendment clearly is not subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision of the bill relates to keeping a record of certain events and reporting thereon. The provisions of the amendment relate to the entry of certain mails under certain classes. Therefore it is new subject-matter, and is not germane to the amendment, and the Chair is again constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just two small items and then I will move that the committee rise. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 2, page 18:

"The chief officer of the several Executive Departments, independent bureaus, and Government establishments, having headquarters in Washington, D. C., shall maintain from July 1 to December 31, 1906, a record of all mail entered at Washington by each under the penalty privilege during said period, so as to show the character and quantity of said mail by the several classes of mail as defined by law, and report to Congress not later than February 1, 1907, the number of pieces and weight by the said several classes of mail, and the amount of postage which would have been required for each of said respective classes, calculated at the regular postage rates, as provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office car service, $5,875,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, in line 4, after "dollars," insert: "Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of rent of railway post-office cars not in actual use in the service of the transportation of the mail."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment. I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that no such payment is now made.

Mr. MACON. I understood that in the hearings before the committee it was shown that there were 215 of these cars on which payment was made which were not so in use.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; there is not a dollar paid for a railway post-office car except for the actual travel of the car—the mileage of the car based upon the law.

Mr. MACON. In the proceedings before the committee did not General Shallenberger, or whoever has charge of that matter, say that there were 215 of them paid for annually that were not in use, and that there was no warrant of law for paying for them, either?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No payment is made except for the actual service of the cars.

Mr. MACON. Why did he tell the committee, then, that he paid for 215 cars that were not in use?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not think he said that, because the law would not justify it. I think the gentleman must clearly have misunderstood him.

Mr. MACON. He stated clearly that it was done, and that there was no warrant of law for it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not want to appear as disputing what anybody has said. I merely state what the law is—that no car is paid for except for actual service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think this view is properly justified to some extent by the statement of the Second Assistant to this effect—that your car pay is not per car, but per line; and I want to say to this committee that it is a pretty difficult matter for me to figure out to a nicety exactly how that pay is made up. I know what is said to constitute a line.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the R. P. O. car pay is for service, and there is no pay granted where there is no service.

Mr. MACON. On the point of order I desire to state that the amendment is a limitation upon the appropriation and certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is about to rule with the gentleman from Arkansas. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MACON) there were—ayes 32, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—post-office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present for printing in the RECORD the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be printed under the rule.

COURTS IN THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12863) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Texas, and to provide terms of court at Victoria, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HON. JOHN M. PINCKNEY.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to vacate so much of the order made on March 7 as fixed April 15 as the day for addresses on the life, character, and services of the late Hon. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, late a Representative from the State of Texas, and to offer the following order, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That a session of the House be held on Sunday, April 29, and that the day be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection; and the order was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that leaves the order standing on April 15 for memorial services on the life, character, and public services of Hon. BENJAMIN F. MARSH, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13154. An act for the relief of John T. Irion;

H. R. 9165. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation to certain lands for cemetery purposes;

H. R. 2996. An act to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the United States transport Mobile in July and August, 1898; and

H. R. 16140. An act to authorize the maintaining and operating for toll an existing structure across Tugaloo River, known as "Knox's bridge," at a point where said river is the boundary between the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 59. An act providing for the establishment of a uniform building line on streets in the District of Columbia less than 90 feet in width—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 5537. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homesteads to the natives of Alaska—to the Committee on Public Lands.

S. 5288. An act appropriating $5,000 to inclose and beautify the monument on the Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina—to the Committee on the Library.

CARRYING OF DANGEROUS ARTICLES ON PASSENGER STEAMERS.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 5514) to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers, and I submit a report. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. The Inspection Department has recently ruled that under the existing law yachts can not be permitted to carry naphtha enough for their tenders. This is simply to remedy that, and to allow them to do it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in lines 5 and 6, to strike out the words "wherever it" and to insert "where it first;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4472 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "passengers," where it first occurs in said section, the words "for hire."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On April 12:

S. 4130. An act to authorize the Capital City Improvement Company, of Helena, Mont., to construct a dam across the Missouri River.

CORINTH AND SHILOH ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 16125) authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURKETT. The bill was objected to yesterday morning by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. MONEY. I will state, if the Senator will permit me, that I have seen the Senator from New Jersey, and he has no objection to the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I have not any objection strictly to the consideration of the bill, but I do object to its passage. It seems to me that at this time it ought not to be taken up by unanimous consent. I ask that it may go over until such time when it can be given some proper consideration by the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Has he read the bill?

Mr. BURKETT. I certainly have. I should not have objected if I had not read it.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator who objected yesterday had not read it. That is why I put the question.

Mr. BURKETT. I have read it, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will permit me to go on now, I will yield all the time I have to him to state his objection. He has read the bill and of course knows as much about it as he ever will.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say that I should like to have an opportunity to see the report. I have been trying to get a copy of the report since yesterday morning, when attention was first called to it. The bill was only brought in yesterday morning. It was called up even before the report was printed. Before it is considered I should like to have an opportunity to make some inquiry as to the practice with reference to the other parks. I have always taken the position, I will say to the Senator, that in these national parks we ought to keep out street-car tracks in the main. I do not know of any place where there ought to be an extension. We all know that a great many efforts have been made to get street cars through the Yellowstone Park.

My judgment is that we ought to keep these national parks free from those things, keep them as closely akin to nature as we can, but improve them enough to enable people to go through them properly. As I understand it, with one or two exceptions the Government has kept street cars out of national parks. Before the bill is considered, I want to have an opportunity to look somewhat into this matter and see in what parks, if any, we have let street cars go, to what extent they have been allowed, and what restriction has been put upon them.

I have been able to get only the report made in the House on this bill, and I am informed that the Senate committee's report adopts the House report. If I read the report and bill aright, the House amended the bill and provided for running street cars through the park after the bill had been submitted to the Park Commission, and while the Park Commission did at a certain time say that they could not see any objection to the bill, it is quite evident to my mind that it did not have the provision in it allowing the car track to go through the park. I should like to have an opportunity of two or three days until I can make some investigation to find out to what extent we have limited the running of cars in the parks and what restrictions have been put upon them. That is my object in asking that the bill be not now considered.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me?

Mr. MONEY. The Senator will excuse me one moment. The Senator from Nebraska certainly has a right to object without any inquiry by me for his reasons for it, but I supposed that the Senator, like the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who objected yesterday, objected simply because he had not had his attention called to it. Having given it his attention, he says that he has a desire further to investigate the matter. I shall not press the bill, of course, but he has really stated now, I think, about everything that can be said against it.

If the Senator will permit me, I want to say to him that the bill has the approval of the Secretary of War and the Park Commission, and the bill as amended was simply a refusal to put in the grant of a right of way and to give only a license or permit. That was the amendment, and it relieved the bill of all objection.

Mr. BURKETT. I noticed that there was an amendment made in the House to strike out certain lines and put in these in lieu thereof:

> To permit and license the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to lay a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park and operate electric cars through said park.

Mr. MONEY. That is right. Before that it was proposed to give a right of way through it. That was stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MONEY. By unanimous consent; I so understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CUBA SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, with reference to the claim of the Cuba Submarine Telegraph Company, a British corporation, for compensation of the expenses incurred in repairing the damage done to its cables and property by United States forces during the war with Spain.

I renew the recommendation which I made to the Congress on December 11, 1903, that as an act of equity and comity provision be made for the reimbursement to the company of the actual expenses incurred by it in the repair of its lines and property.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1906.

JOHN H. THARP.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13247) for the relief of John H. Tharp, of Eversonville, Mo.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to John H. Tharp, of Eversonville, Mo., $35, being the amount stolen from a registered letter belonging to John H. Tharp and collected by the United States Government from a mail contractor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND FOR CEMETERY AT KEYSTONE, S. DAK.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8278) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to Keystone Camp, No. 2879, of the Modern Woodmen of America, to certain lands for cemetery purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOREIGN-BUILT DREDGES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 395) concerning foreign-built dredges.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a memorandum upon the bill at the desk to the effect that the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] desires to be present when the bill is considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall now that the Senator from Washington spoke to me about it. I withdraw my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over for the moment.

EDWARD KELLY.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5358) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Edward Kelly.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Edward Kelly, formerly a private in Companies K and C, Fortieth New York Infantry Volunteers, and to issue him an honorable discharge: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. A. M'LEAN.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4948) for the relief of W. A. McLean.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay W. A. McLean, of Wilkesboro, N. C., $117.69, for money due him under a judgment of the United States court for the western district of North Carolina, rendered at November term, 1904, at Wilkesboro, N. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. HALE. The morning business has been concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has been closed, and bills are being considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Then let us go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine demands the regular order, which is the Calendar under Rule VIII. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA.

The bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the bill go over. It is the subject of a good deal of debate, and I should think it had better go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

THE MOROCCAN CONFERENCE.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution submitted by Mr. BACON, January 8, 1906, requesting the President to furnish the Senate with copies of papers relating to the holding of a conference on matters relating to Morocco, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

IDAHO STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

The bill (S. 577) granting to the State of Idaho 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was read.

Mr. CARTER. The bill involves a question of policy and will likely lead to considerable discussion. I suggest that it be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WYOMING STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 608) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

Mr. CARTER. That bill is in the same category.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over without prejudice.

ACCOUNTS WITH STATES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 311) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. That is a very important bill. Let it go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX, on the request of the Senator from Maine.

AGREEMENT WITH KLAMATH INDIANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1794) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect.

Mr. LODGE. That is an important bill. I think it should go over.

Mr. FULTON. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his objection for a moment? I should like to make a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The bill or one similar to it has been reported very many times unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is for the payment of a sum of money that is due in all equity and good conscience to these Indians, and were it due to any other persons than Indians it would have been paid long ago. It has been objected to many times, because there is a large sum involved. I simply wish to take advantage of this opportunity briefly to explain it, in the hope that Senators will not insist upon objection to the bill. The money surely ought to be paid, and the claim be put out of the way. It has been long since due, and had as well be paid now as at any time.

However, if Senators will not consent to have the bill considered I shall not call it up again. I will feel that I have done my duty in this matter. It is a just obligation on the Government, but if Senators insist on urging objections to the bill of course I can not help it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection the bill will go over.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. 1794) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect. I simply meant to call attention to it, and I withdraw the objection. I have examined the report, and I think the bill is a proper one.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MEDALS OF HONOR.

The bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. In line 6, after the word "who," I move to strike out down to and including the word "battle," in line 9, and insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after the word "who," it is proposed to strike out "may hereafter distinguish themselves in action, or who display conspicuous gallantry or render specially meritorious service otherwise than in battle" and insert "have most distinguished or may hereafter most distinguish themselves by their gallantry in action;" so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be struck medals of honor of such design and class as may be appropriate, and to present the same to officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who have most distinguished or may hereafter most distinguish themselves by their gallantry in action.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. This, I think, is better than the original form. It is the rule which is followed in the Army, and limits such awards to gallantry in action.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXISTING STATUS OF SANTO DOMINGO.

ACCOUNTS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 189) to authorize the readjustment of the accounts of army officers in certain cases, and for other purposes, was read.

Mr. LODGE. That appeared to me to be a pretty important bill, as I glanced at it. I should think it had better go to the Calendar under Rule IX. There is a long report accompanying it. I do not myself feel able to vote on it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over under Rule IX.

Mr. FLINT. It is the same bill, as I understand, to which the Senator heretofore objected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made some little allusion to the consumption of cotton in the United States, and introduced some statistics which were not up to date. I have here Census Bulletin No. 25, for the year ending August 31, 1905, showing the whole situation at the latest date for which we have any official figures. As a matter of information to the people of the country who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that I introduced no figures about the consumption of cotton. Those figures were introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. All I introduced were figures as to the number of spindles.

Mr. TILLMAN. As to the number of spindles and consumption of cotton relatively, North and South.

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad if the Senator would have it printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. The number of spindles, the number of bales, and everything connected with the present manufacture North and South.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator will have it printed in the RECORD. I shall be very glad to see it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it is not very long, I should like to have it printed as a document.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no objection to that. I shall be very glad to have it printed as a document.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will add that to the Senator's request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the document presented by the Senator from South Carolina will be printed in the RECORD, and will also be printed as a public document.

The document referred to is as follows:

HOME CONSUMPTION OF DOMESTIC COTTON.

The statistics of stocks, takings, and consumption of raw cotton by southern consumers have been collected by personal canvasses of the local special agents of this Bureau appointed to collect cotton-ginning statistics, augmented by direct correspondence with the manufacturers, and those for the cotton consumers located in other than the cotton-producing States have been collected, as a rule, through correspondence, assisted in the concentrated mill centers by personal visits from special agents of this Bureau.

Southern mills.—The following table shows the stocks, takings, and consumption of the southern cotton-consuming establishments:

[a] Includes Florida, Indian Territory, Kansas, Kentucky, and Oklahoma.

The returns of southern cotton-consuming establishments show that 81,299 bales of raw cotton were in the mills on September 1, 1904, compared with 236,043 bales on August 31, 1905. This indicates an increase in holdings of 154,744 bales, or 190.3 per cent. It must be remembered, however, that at the beginning of the season of 1904–5 the country was probably more nearly bare of cotton than in any previous year since the civil war. A comparison of stock holdings at the beginning and close of this season will not, therefore, give a correct idea of the normal holdings of the mills. A comparison is being made between a season of famine and one of plenty, and the showing does not afford an adequate idea of a normal condition among the mills.

On the basis of the consumption reported for the season of 1904–5, the southern mills had in stock on September 1, 11 per cent of their necessary supplies for the season of 1905–6, while the northern group of mills held 19.2 per cent of their necessary supplies for the year. The average weekly consumption of the mills in the entire country has been for the season 82,288 bales. The total stocks of the mills of this country as reported amount to 647,562 bales, or 15.1 per cent of the year's requirements. However, much progress is in evidence throughout the Southern States, new mills being erected and additional spindles being added in old mills; under normal conditions, therefore, much of the increased stock holdings reported will be required to feed these new spindles.

The takings reported in Table 7 are net—that is, all cotton purchased and resold without undergoing some process of manufacture has been excluded.

The average weight of the bale reported in the last column of the table is net—that is, exclusive of the weight of the bagging and ties. To compare this weight with that reported in Bulletin 19 on cotton ginning it is necessary to add 22 pounds, the average weight returned for bagging and ties.

Northern mills.—The following table shows the stocks, takings, and consumption of the northern cotton-consuming establishments, by States:

The total stocks of cotton held by northern mills September 1, 1904, as reported in Table 8, amounted to 267,155 bales, compared with 411,519 bales on August 31, 1905, an increase of 144,364 bales, or 54 per cent. The takings reported for the year are net—that is, exclusive of cotton bought and resold. The average weekly consumption amounts to 41,131 bales, and upon this basis the supplies on hand August 31, 1905, were sufficient to meet the consumptive requirements for about ten weeks. Of the 411,519 bales of cotton on hand August 31, 1905, the mills in Massachusetts have reported 194,453 bales, or 47.3 per cent of the total holdings of the mills of this group, and 30 per cent of the stocks held by all of the mills of the country.

The average weight of the bale returned by these mills is 497 pounds. In a number of instances where the information has been secured from the mills of this group by correspondence, the gross weight rather than the net weight has been returned. The average weight of the bale, therefore, which appears in the final column of Table 8 is believed to approximate more nearly the gross than the net weight.

SPINDLES AND CONSUMPTION.

Southern States.—The following table shows the number of establishments consuming domestic raw cotton, the number of cotton spindles, the amount of cotton consumed and produced, and the percentage the consumption is of the production for the Southern States:

[a] Including 177,488 cotton spindles in idle plants.

[b] Including 25,154 bales of raw cotton in establishments not spinning cotton.

[c] Includes Florida, Indian Territory, Kansas, Kentucky, and Oklahoma.

As shown in Table 9, there are 766 establishments in the Southern States which consume raw cotton. This number includes spinning mills and those establishments which use raw cotton in the manufacture of mattresses, batting, felt, and the like. In some instances, where more than one mill is under the same ownership, consolidated returns have been received, and consequently the number of mills reported may be slightly less than the actual number. Statistics for all the mills, however, are included in this report.

The statistics of spindles, as given in Tables 9 and 10, were returned on the schedules at the general manufactures census for the year ending December 31, 1904, and in comparing these statistics of spindles with those compiled by other authorities for a later date the number added by the mills since the close of the last calendar year must be added to the statistics given in this report. The number of active and idle spindles in southern mills on August 31, 1905, as compiled by Mr. Hester, is 8,685,393. The number, as compiled by the Financial and Commercial Chronicle, for the northern mills is 15,325,000. It is noteworthy that the total number of spindles compiled from these two sources is 24,010,393, compared with 24,077,524 reported by the Bureau of the Census, a difference of only 67,131. Computing on the basis of the active spindles, shown in this table, and the cotton returned as consumed to August 31, 1905, the average annual consumption of cotton per spindle for the year is found to be 124.5 pounds in the southern mills. It is thus evident that the large output of the southern mills this season has been mainly of heavy fabrics to supply a greatly increased demand from China and the Orient.

The cotton consumption in the southern mills amounts to 15.6 per cent of the entire American production. Not counting Virginia, which secures practically all of its supplies from other States, North Carolina leads in the per cent of production consumed, showing 78.4 per cent, compared with 51.4 per cent in South Carolina and 23.9 per cent in Georgia. The consumption of mills in the two Carolinas amounts to 56.8 per cent of that of the Southern States. For the country Massachusetts ranks first and South Carolina second in cotton consumption, although the combined consumption of the two Carolinas exceeds that of Massachusetts by 170,844 bales.

Northern States.—The following table shows the number of spindles and the consumption of raw cotton, in bales and pounds, for the northern manufacturers, by States:

The net takings of the northern manufacturers in the group of States given in Table 8, for the year ending August 31, 1905, was 2,283,193 bales, compared with 2,294,895 by southern manufacturers, as shown in Table 7. The consumption of cotton in the establishments of the northern group was 2,138,829 bales, compared with 2,140,151 for the southern group.

The total number of producing spindles in the United States, as returned for the year ending December 31, 1904, is reported at 24,077,524, of which 8,211,734 were in the South and 15,865,790 in the North. Notwithstanding the great difference in the number of spindles of the two sections, the consumption of cotton is practically the same. The annual consumption of cotton per spindle in the northern mills, reckoned on the basis given in Table 10, in 67.1 pounds, compared with 124.5 pounds in the South. The difference in the per spindle consumption indicates that the northern mills are spinning yarns of very much greater fineness than those turned out by the southern mills. The finer the yarn is spun the greater the number of hanks obtained from a given quantity of raw cotton, and consequently the slower the process of consuming cotton. Massachusetts, with 8,388,533 spindles, is reported as having consumed 1,044,169 bales, while the southern mills, with 8,211,734 spindles, have consumed 2,140,151 bales. North Carolina, with 24.5 per cent of the number of spindles reported for Massachusetts, has consumed 56.9 per cent of the quantity of cotton consumed in the latter State. A further illustration of this condition is found in Great Britain, where the number of spindles is 48,400,000 and the consumption of cotton 3,588,000 bales, against a consumption in the United States of 4,278,980 bales with 24,077,524 spindles.

GROWTH OF COTTON PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

The following table shows the production and consumption of cotton and the number of spindles in the United States in the years named:

[c] Not including idle spindles.
[d] In cotton mills.

The production statistics shown in Table 11 for 1880 and 1890 are taken from census reports for those years. Those for 1900, 1903, 1904, and 1905 were returned to the Bureau of the Census by the cotton ginners. The statistics of consumption and spindles are census figures except for 1903 and 1904, for which years the statistics of consumption have been taken from the reports of Mr. Henry G. Hester, and those of spindles from compilations of the New York Financial and Commercial Chronicle, checked against statistics from other sources.

In the twenty-five years covered by the statistics of this table, the production of the United States has increased from 5,755,359 to 13,693,279 bales. In the same period the total consumption of cotton in the country has increased from 1,671,383 to 4,278,980 bales. Within the last five years the cotton-consuming establishments of the Southern States have increased their consumption from 1,483,711 to 2,140,151 bales, an increase of 656,440 bales. During these five years the northern cotton-consuming establishments have actually decreased their consumption by 16,955 bales. This is explained by the fact that these mills have been engaged during this period in replacing old machinery by that which is more modern, thus increasing the efficiency of their plants and the fineness of the yarns spun without making very large increases in the number of spindles.

In 1880 the southern mills contained 542,048 spindles and consumed 183,453 bales of cotton. For the year ending December 31, 1904, these mills reported 8,211,734 spindles, and during the year ending August 31, 1905, there were consumed in these mills 2,140,151 bales of cotton.

The cotton consumption per spindle in the South in 1880 was, according to the census, 155.9 pounds, compared with 161.4 in 1890 and 164.6 in 1900. There is a marked tendency toward the production of finer yarns in these mills, the average consumption per spindle at this time being reported as 124.5 pounds, a decrease of 40.1 pounds per spindle. The average annual consumption per spindle in northern mills in 1900 was 75.2 pounds, and in 1905 is 67.1 pounds, a decrease of 8.1 pounds per spindle. While the South shows a greater decrease in pounds per spindle, these conditions in both sections have brought about a material decrease in the average for the country, which is now 86.2 pounds per spindle, compared with 95.4 in 1900.

COTTON PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF THE WORLD.

In the statistics shown in Table 12 for the cotton production and spindles in the United States, census figures are used. In compiling the statistics of production, consumption, and spindles in the other countries, several authorities have been consulted, among them reports of Mr. Henry G. Hester, the Financial and Commercial Chronicle, and Cotton Facts, by Mr. Alfred B. Shepperson. All of these authorities employ estimates, more or less, in their compilations, and in publishing the statistics the Bureau of the Census does not claim accuracy further than for the United States, but simply presents them as an interesting reference in connection with the study of the cotton trade.

The following table shows the world's cotton production and consumption by countries:

According to the statistics presented in Table 12 the world's cotton production for 1904, entering commercial channels, was 18,041,859 bales, with a total consumption of 15,474,980 bales. This indicates a surplus in the world's factory supply of cotton amounting to 2,566,879 bales. The total production and consumption of cotton as shown in Table 12, however, does not represent the full statistics for the world. Large quantities of cotton are grown and consumed in China, Japan, Asiatic Russia, and other eastern countries, and in South and Central America, which do not enter into commercial channels and can not be estimated with any certainty.

The following is an approximate distribution of the spindles in the mills of continental Europe, shown in Table 12, in thousands:[a]

ASSAY OFFICE AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

The bill (S. 2878) to establish an assay office at Salt Lake City, State of Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTER. Inasmuch as the melter checks accounts with the assayer, it may be deemed expedient by the Director of the Mint to designate some other officer to act as melter instead of the assayer. I suggest that the bill be amended by inserting in line 12, after the word "melter," the words which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 12, after the word "melter," it is proposed to insert "unless the Director of the Mint designates another officer or employee to discharge the duties of melter;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to establish an assay office of the United States at Salt Lake City, in the State of Utah; said assay office to be conducted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relating to the mints and assay offices and the coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; that the officers of the assay office shall be an assayer in charge, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, who shall also perform the duties of melter, unless the Director of the Mint designates another officer or employee to discharge the duties of melter; chief clerk, at a salary of $1,500 per annum; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building for the use of said assay office, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000 for salary of assayer in charge, chief clerk, and wages of workmen, rent, and contingent expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILD ANIMALS IN GRAND CANYON FOREST RESERVE.

The bill (S. 2732) for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the request of the Senator from Idaho, the bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

APPALACHIAN AND WHITE MOUNTAIN FOREST RESERVES.

The bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the Appalachian Forest Reserve and the White Mountain Reserve, respectively, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who reported that bill—I do not see him in the Chamber—I think it had better go over, without losing its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

The bill (S. 2948) to amend section 1 of the act approved March 3, 1905, providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Arizona, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "two," to strike out the words "or more;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act named in the above title, providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Arizona, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1905, be so amended that the first section thereof shall read as follows:

"That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Arizona shall consist of a chief justice and four associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, but three justices must concur in order to reverse a judgment or other determination of a district court, except that in cases where two of the five justices are now or hereafter may be disqualified from sitting in such case or cases the justices not disqualified shall constitute a quorum and a majority thereof may reverse or affirm such case or cases."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to have the Secretary again read the first paragraph of that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the act named in the above title——

Mr. CARTER. I think it is a very well-established principle of law that the title of a bill is no part of the act itself. Therefore a bill proposing to amend an act must recapitulate the title of the act, and not merely by reference, because the title is cut away absolutely and the reference would have no significance when the act appears in the statutes. I suggest that an amendment be made by striking out the words "named in the above title," on page 1, line 3.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the words "named in the above title;" so as to read:

That the act providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Arizona, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1905, be so amended that the first section thereof shall read as follows, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE, SURGERY, AND DENTISTRY IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 2554) for the regulation of the practice of medicine, surgery, and dentistry in the district of Alaska was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. HOPKINS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to examine the bill with some care, and I ask that it may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desired to raise the same objection that the Senator from New Hampshire has raised.

CLAIM OF STATE OF RHODE ISLAND.

The bill (S. 4652) for the relief of the State of Rhode Island was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a House bill of similar import on the Calendar, and I ask that it may be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of the State of Rhode Island was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out, after the word "Spain," in line 6, the words:

And in said resettlement and readjustment the same rules shall be applied as have been applied by the Auditor and Comptroller in the settlement of the like claims of other States. And allowances shall also be made in such resettlement and readjustment of the same class or character of items disallowed that were disallowed in the settlement of the like claim of the State of Iowa, for which appropriation was made under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1900.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved July 8, 1898, March 3, 1899, and April 27, 1904.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to resettle and readjust the claim of the State of Rhode Island for and on account of its expenditures in raising volunteers during the war with Spain under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved July 8, 1898, March 3, 1899, and April 27, 1904.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the bill ought to pass without the amendment, and I therefore ask that it lie on the table, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill (S. 4652) for the relief of the State of Rhode Island was indefinitely postponed.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

The bill (S. 3632) to amend an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment on page 2, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows, to wit: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls on account of services in the Mexican war, and who, from age, accident, or disease, is disabled for manual labor and is in such circumstances that the pension he now receives is insufficient to provide him with the necessaries of life, to $20 per month. That all pensioners provided for in this act shall be deemed to be disabled for manual labor when they have attained the age of 75 years.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I suggest that the amendment should not be agreed to. Any Mexican veteran who is 75 years of age should receive a pension of $30 a month from the Government of the United States. I therefore hope that the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think we should agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Montana. This matter was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Pensions, and under all the circumstances, considering what we are granting others, and the possibility of getting some bill through both branches of Congress at this term, I suggest to the Senator from Montana that we had better pass the bill with the rate at $20 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to add that this is the largest service pension that has ever been granted in the history of the Government—$20 per month. I quite agree with the chairman of the Committee on Pensions that the bill ought not to pass with a larger amount in it than that. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I do not object to the passage of this bill, but I can see no good reason why a similar provision should not be made for the soldiers of the civil war who have reached the age of 75.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are twenty years younger. That is the reason.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PILOTAGE CHARGES IN THE COASTING TRADE.

The bill (S. 30) to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. Let the bill be passed over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Maine.

RETIREMENT OF NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICERS, ETC.

The bill (S. 3638) providing for the retirement of noncommissioned officers, petty officers, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that when an enlisted man shall have served thirty years either in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or in all, he shall, upon making application to the President, be placed upon the retired list, with 75 per cent of the pay and allowances he may then be in receipt of.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

F. H. DRISCOLL.

The bill (H. R. 10584) for the relief of F. H. Driscoll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay F. H. Driscoll $80, in full payment for services rendered the United States as storekeeper-gauger in charge of special bonded warehouse No. 6, first district of California.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENALTY FOR CERTAIN OFFENSES IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 11275) increasing the penalty for certain offenses in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ULYSSES G. WINN.

The bill (S. 3241) to reimburse Ulysses G. Winn for money erroneously paid into the Treasury of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "thirty-two;" so as to read:

That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $132.80, to reimburse Ulysses G. Winn for said amount erroneously deposited by him while United States commissioner at Center and Stonewall.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM JOHN WRIGHT, WILLIAM ANGLE, ET AL.

The bill (S. 4725) to provide for the division of penalty recovered under the alien contract-labor law, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William John Wright, William Angle, Charles Lewis, and Harry Johnson, in equal shares, the sum of $2,000, which sum the bill appropriates, it being one-half of a judgment recovered by the United States from the Tile, Grate, and Mantel Association of New York for violation of the alien contract-labor law, upon information given by the said Wright, Angle, Lewis, and Johnson.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN DELAWARE BAY AND RIVER.

The bill (S. 4967) to establish additional aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "exceed," to strike out "three hundred and ninety" and insert "four hundred and sixty;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide for the establishing of the following additional aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River, at a cost not to exceed $460,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, on page 1, and lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 2, in the following words:

First. A light-house and fog signal on Horseshoe Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.
Second. A light-house and fog signal on Brown Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $80,000.
Third. A light-house and fog signal on Miah Maul Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.
Fourth. A light-house and fog signal on Joe Flogger Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.
Fifth. A light-house and fog signal on Arnolds Point Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $85,000.

And insert:

First. A light-house and fog signal on Horseshoe Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.
Second. A light-house and fog signal on Miah Maull Shoal, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.

The bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. That is a very long bill. It may affect the waters of Niagara, and so on. I think it had better go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not affect the waters of Niagara, inasmuch as they are excluded. But let the bill go over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS TO INDIANS.

The bill (H. R. 11946) to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from North Dakota, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JAMES W. JONES.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6982) for the relief of James W. Jones.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope we will go on with the Calendar.

Mr. McLAURIN. This bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Idaho the bill will go over under Rule IX, together with the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I make the same request as to the former bill—that it go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has gone to the Calendar under Rule IX.

PRACTICE OF PHARMACY IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 8997) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments, which are numerous, may be acted upon as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 1, page 2, line 10, after the word "Provided," to strike out "however."

The amendment was agreed to.

And said court is hereby authorized to hear and determine any case so presented and to issue such orders and decrees revoking or suspending such license as to said court may seem proper.

So as to make the section read:

It shall be the duty of the major and superintendent of police of said District to investigate any case in which it is discovered by him, or made to appear to his satisfaction, that any license issued under the provisions of this act is revocable and to report the result of such investigation to the board of supervisors in medicine and pharmacy, which board shall, after full hearing, if in their judgment the facts warrant it, revoke such license.

No person shall make any false or fraudulent representation for the purpose of procuring a license, permit, or renewal thereof, either for himself or for another.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to know why that amendment is put into the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The clause is stricken out.

Mr. FRYE. Why is that amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was reported by the committee for the reason that the committee did not see any reason why it should be in the bill. It is to be assumed that if a man makes a false or fraudulent representation he is amenable to the laws, and that that should be stated in the act the committee thought was unnecessary.

Mr. FRYE. But it seems to me that striking out those words is simply an invitation to all scoundrelly druggists, if there are any, to commit fraud. The corporation counsel says that the bill should contain such a clause, and that the recent experience of the present board has demonstrated that a pharmacy bill is almost void without it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. Mr. President, the Senator and I will not have a controversy over this clause. I am quite willing that the amendment shall be disagreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Thanks. And where it occurs in one other place, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take that up when we get to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is disagreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 8, after the word "such," to strike out "license or;" so as to make the clause read:

Every license to practice pharmacy, and every permit to sell poisons for use in the arts or as insecticides, and every current renewal of such permit shall be conspicuously displayed by the person to whom the same has been issued in the pharmacy, drug store, or place of business, if any, of which the said person is the owner or manager.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 10, line 19, after the word "examiner," to strike out the comma; in line 20, before the word "expire," to strike out "but not more than one, will" and insert "shall;" and on page 11, line 1, after the word "remove," to insert "after full hearing;" so as to read:

All appointments shall be made in such manner that the term of office of one examiner shall expire on the 30th day of June of each year, but every examiner shall hold office after the expiration of the term for which he has been formally appointed until his successor has been appointed and qualified. No appointee shall enter upon the discharge of his duties until he has taken oath fairly and impartially to perform the same. And said board of supervisors shall have all such rights, powers, and duties with respect to the examination of applicants for license as pharmacists and with reference to the issue of licenses to practice pharmacy and of permits to sell poisons for use in the arts or as insecticides as said board now has with reference to the examination of applicants for license to practice medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and with reference to the issue of licenses to such persons, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act. Said board shall elect from its membership a secretary and treasurer, respectively. The treasurer of said board shall give such bond for the proper performance of his duties as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall deem proper, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 14, line 1, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for renewing license as pharmacist, $1;" so as to make the clause read:

That applicants for license to practice pharmacy and for permits to sell poisons for use in the arts or as insecticides shall pay the following fees: For examination for license as pharmacist, $10; for a permit for the sale of poisons for use in the arts or as insecticides, $1, and for each renewal thereof, 50 cents.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he desires to go on with the bill now or if anyone desires to speak upon it?

Mr. TILLMAN. I know of no one who wants to speak on the bill, unless it is the Senator from North Dakota. I have been making diligent inquiry, and almost everybody seems to want to put off speaking until Monday or Tuesday. If the Senator wants to take the floor upon the bill, I shall be glad to hear him. If not, I shall ask to have the bill laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to ask, if no one desires to take the floor on the unfinished business, that we proceed with the consideration of the Calendar. There is quite a large Pension Calendar which would soon be reached.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside for the balance of the day.

DISPOSAL OF TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It went to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask that it be restored to the Calendar, so as to retain its place without prejudice.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is not now here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the bill went to the Calendar under Rule IX at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], and that the next order of business, the bill (S. 5222) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves, went to the Calendar under Rule IX at the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I had previously had a talk with one, indeed with both the Senators about it, and as chairman of the committee from which the bill came I desire to have it retain its place. Had I been in the Chamber at the time when it was reached I should have insisted that it should retain its place.

Mr. GALLINGER. One objection would have carried it over anyway.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There ought not to be any prejudice against the bill. It is a very important piece of legislation, and Senators who are opposing it should not, it seems to me, put it to that test. Now that it has gone to the Calendar under Rule IX, I shall be obliged to call it up, as we will not again reach it on the Calendar. I wish it understood that I shall make a motion to call up the bill at an early day.

AGRICULTURAL LANDS WITHIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. CARTER. With reference to the bill (S. 5222) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves, I desire to give notice that during the afternoon, if the Calendar shall have been disposed of, I will move that the bill be taken up for consideration. It has passed to the Calendar under Rule IX, I understand.

Mr. KEAN. I have no special interest in the bill, but the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is interested in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will announce the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out "seventeen" and insert "thirty." I desire to make a brief statement of the case.

This man is living in Pueblo. He was in the service during the Spanish war. He was a hearty, hale young man when he went in, and was apparently so when he came out. However, not long afterwards he had great trouble. He is now a paralytic, and the doctor's statement shows that he is absolutely unable to do any manual work whatever. A gentleman whom I know very well, from his town, called on me within a few days, and told me that the beneficiary of this bill is in such condition that he is unable to do anything and, in fact, needs an assistant in order to get about. The officers certify that this man was a good soldier, and before he went into the service was known as a very energetic, pushing young man. It is a very sad case, and I ask that instead of $17 we give $30. He is 35 years of age.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that the statement made by the Senator from Colorado would fully justify the pension being allowed at $30 under the rule which we have adopted in the committee, and hence I have no objection to the amendment. The report which we had before us, and on which we based the amount which was reported, does not show the condition of the claimant as it is now explained by the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amount involved in that bill?

Mr. LODGE. Two hundred dollars.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said: Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 6675) for the relief of the Methodist Church at New Haven, Ky., was passed, and I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to that motion.

Mr. McCREARY. What is the bill to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SPOONER. It is to pay $200 to a Methodist Church in Kentucky on account of damages alleged to have been sustained by its occupation by Union forces during the civil war. I should like to know something about it.

Mr. McCREARY. The amount which is asked for in the bill is small—only $200.

Mr. SPOONER. But the principle involved is very large.

Mr. McCREARY. This claim was thoroughly investigated by the committee of the House of Representatives, and it passed that House. It came here and was investigated by the Committee on Claims. I remember my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] visited Kentucky and made a very eloquent speech at Shelbyville, in the adjoining county—Larue County. The Hon. DAVID H. SMITH, the present Member of Congress, resides there, and the bill was introduced by him. I am glad my friend from Wisconsin has taken so much interest in the bills which pertain to Kentucky.

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is not that; but I observed during the six years I was chairman of the Committee on Claims of this body that at almost every session of the committee the time was consumed by the consideration of bills to pay for the occupation of churches in Southern States. I doubt if there is a church in West Virginia which the Government did not pay for during those years.

Mr. KEAN. I can assure the Senator they are not yet all paid for.

Mr. SPOONER. And they never will be all paid for, either, until we stop paying such claims. There ought to be a constitutional amendment prohibiting Congress from paying these damages—these antediluvian bills. This claim is established by only one affidavit.

Mr. McCREARY. This is a very meritorious bill. As the report shows, I think this is one of the most meritorious bills ever presented to Congress. The church was damaged very much more than the amount claimed.

Mr. SPOONER. As I have stated, this claim is established by the affidavit of one person, Charles Darwin Pennebaker. It is not very possible that I should consent to the passage of this bill because I made a speech in an adjoining county.

Mr. McCREARY. No; but I only wanted to locate it for the Senator. He spoke in one part of Kentucky, and this was in another part.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, I may have damaged the Democrats—I hope I did—in Kentucky; but I did not hurt this church. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY. I know that all the Democrats, as well as the Republicans, spoke well of the Senator's speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator; I think they laughed and applauded.

Mr. BACON. After the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin can not further object to the proposition. He ought not to, at least.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think I want the Government to pay for compliments to me.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish the Senator would hear the report.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest to the Senator that this motion be passed over. I have entered the motion to reconsider. Let it lie over and I will look into the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. It is only $200, and the members of the Methodist Church are very anxious to have this money. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. And it is just about Easter time, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY. And I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist on his motion to reconsider the bill. However, I will not move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. As I think there is not a quorum present, the Senator had better not try that.

Mr. McCREARY. I am not going to move to lay the motion on the table; and I should not do so even if a quorum were present.

Mr. SPOONER. I will take the matter up, and look over it with the Senator.

Mr. McCREARY. Could the Senator not take it up now?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I will take it up now.

Mr. McCREARY. I know very little about it, except what I learn from the report.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator can not give me any information about it.

Mr. McCREARY. Except that I have received letters from members of that church telling me that the damage as stated in the report was correct, and I have also talked with the Member of Congress from the district, who resides near New Haven.

Mr. SPOONER. The Member of Congress always desires to have passed everything his people want. It is, as the Senator says, a small matter.

Mr. McCREARY. It is a small matter.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says that in a tone of voice that is very appealing, but I should like to inquire when this business is going to stop?

Mr. McCREARY. It will stop with me right here, at present. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; "at present."

Mr. McCREARY. I have no other bill of this kind on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, not to-day.

Mr. McCREARY. No, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Was this church injured?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir; it was injured considerably more than $200 worth.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no statement here that it was injured. This affiant states:

The building was about 40 feet front and 80 feet deep, and such a structure at this time would cost about $3,000 to build.

At that time, whenever possible, I attended Sunday school in that building, and service was held on Sundays whenever possible. I remember distinctly that quite frequently we found the church occupied by United States troops and no service could be held. This occurred quite frequently—

That is quite indefinite—during the civil war. The building was used for hospital purposes, and I have frequently carried supplies and delicacies to sick soldiers confined therein, and have frequently attended burials of the dead. Shortly after the war I was present when the bodies of about forty deceased Union soldiers were disinterred from the church burying grounds and taken to the national cemetery at Lebanon.

The charge made for the use of this church, $200, is, I think, extremely reasonable. In fact, I am certain so. My belief is that the use of the church was worth to the United States for hospital purposes fully $500.

The occupation of the building was not continuous, but occurred from time to time as the necessities of the Army required, commencing in the winter of 1861–62 and continuing off and on thereafter.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that before this bill was reported I took it up with Mr. SMITH, the Member of the House who introduced the bill, and went over it at some length with him. He showed me some of the evidence which they had to prove that the church was damaged, and that it was used by the Union forces quite frequently. The bill was before the Senate Committee on Claims, of which I am a member, when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] then spoke of it more at length than he has here. The Senate Committee on Claims were unanimous in making this report.

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Claims, over which he once presided, as he tells us, are just as fully persuaded as he is, perhaps, that the time must come when we should stop paying these old claims, for the time has passed when people who know about them can give any direct evidence.

This was a small matter. There was no question that the church was used and that it was damaged. The damage may have been little or much; but it was certainly enough to warrant the paying of $200. Not only was the evidence before our committee sufficient, but I took it up individually, as the chairman of the committee asked me to, as he in a manner referred it to me, to investigate it somewhat more fully than the committee had done.

While all the proof was not before our committee, and we did not make any very long report, the case seemed plain, after the Senator from Kentucky had stated it, and we did not incorporate any of the proof, nor did the House incorporate the written proof they had for passing the bill.

I will also say that the bill was debated quite to a considerable extent on the floor of the House at the time it was considered there, and it was carefully investigated. I think it is a very worthy bill.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator went into it personally on evidence which is not made apparent in the report, and found that the church building was damaged, and he thinks, after full consideration, that it is a just claim, I will ask leave to withdraw my motion. But I do think that the pressing of these claims is getting to be an industry, and that the time ought to come, if it has not already arrived, when the United States should quit paying rent for churches occupied off and on, as this report says, by Union soldiers during the war.

Mr. McCREARY. It also refers, I will say to my friend from Wisconsin, to damages that were sustained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the motion to reconsider, and the bill stands passed.

JAMES W. JONES.

The bill (H. R. 6982) for the relief of James W. Jones was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over, Mr. President. I notice from the reading that a part of the statement contained in the bill should be embodied in the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

MADISON COUNTY, KY.

The bill (S. 4823) for the relief of Madison County, Ky., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amount involved in the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amount is not stated in the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the amount is to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SPOONER. But I ask what is the amount?

Mr. McCREARY. There is a statement in the report from the Secretary of the Treasury and also from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The report states that the purpose of the bill is—to authorize and require the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon appeal made to him therefor, to pay back to the treasury of Madison County, Ky., for the use of said county, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, any and all money collected from any and all corporations, or from any other person or party whatsoever, as internal-revenue taxes on dividends on shares of stock owned by said county of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to the extent that such taxes were deducted from dividends due and payable to said county.

The facts were stated to the Committee on Claims, which has reported unanimously in favor of the passage of the bill. This tax was illegally collected some years ago, and the Supreme Court subsequently held that those taxes should not have been collected.

Mr. SPOONER. The Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes. The report continues:

The facts as stated to your committee are that between the years 1869 and 1872, inclusive, said Madison County was the owner of stock, and perhaps bonds, in the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, which company declared cash dividends and interest. Under the internal-revenue laws then in force (sec. 122, act of June 30, 1864), the company aforesaid paid taxes to the United States upon its gross receipts, including its undistributed surplus, the interest payable on its bonds, and its cash dividends. The taxes paid on interest and dividends were deducted from the amounts due as interest and dividends, so that the interest and dividends declared and paid to Madison County were diminished to the extent of such deductions for taxes.

These deductions seem to have been made under a misapprehension of the law as it applied to municipal corporations.

The law as applicable to such corporations was afterwards interpreted by the United States Supreme Court, and that court decided that a tax under the internal-revenue act, section 122, was a tax upon the creditor and not upon the railroad corporation paying it, and that a municipal corporation, being a part of the sovereign power of the State, was not subject to taxation by Congress upon its municipal revenues. (United States v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, 17 Wall., 322.)

The time for repayment of these taxes under the law expired before Madison County made application for such repayment, and this bill is required to remove the bar of the statute of limitations and to authorize the audit and payment back of such amount as had been collected by the Government and deducted from dividends and interest due and payable to said county upon stock and bonds owned by it in the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company.

Similar acts have heretofore been passed for the relief of the counties of Hardin, Hart, Logan, and Simpson, in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. SPOONER. Is this the only county left?

Mr. McCREARY. This is the only county left, and it is the county where I have the honor to reside.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I subside. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "stock," to insert "or bonds;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and are hereby, authorized and required to audit and adjust the claim of Madison County, State of Kentucky, for internal-revenue taxes on dividends on shares of stock or bonds owned by said county in the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to the extent that such taxes were deducted from any dividends due and payable to said county, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to Madison County, State of Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of the claim so audited and adjusted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS F. CALLAN, ALIAS THOMAS COWAN.

The bill (S. 5028) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Thomas F. Callan, alias Thomas Cowan, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. By an oversight that bill was reported without the usual proviso. I move to add to the bill the usual proviso in regard to pay and bounty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Thomas F. Callan, alias Thomas Cowan, late of Company I, Second United States Infantry, to amend his military record accordingly, and to grant said Thomas F. Callan an honorable discharge as of date of August 28, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is completed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 13, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the ages and Father of all souls, whose everlasting arms are about us to uphold, sustain, and guide in every pure, earnest, and noble endeavor to right living, to-day our minds go back to the greatest tragedy in human history, the beginning of individual, civil, political, and religious liberty, and which illustrates the dignity of human nature and signalizes the victory of good over evil, spirit over matter, life over death, the earnest for all who strive for the mastery. So let our hearts sing together—

In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime.

When the woes of life o'ertake me,
Hopes deceive and fears annoy,
Never shall the Cross forsake me;
Lo! it glows with peace and joy.

Help us, O God, to right conceptions and to be true to our convictions. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, the world's great Exemplar, amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a question involving the privileges of the House.

The SPEAKER. That will take precedence of the conference report.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I desire to call up a question involving the privileges of the House and present the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 10th day of April, 1906, in a speech printed this morning in the RECORD, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. HOPKINS, contrary to the law of the House, has embodied the following sentences: "A few days ago Mr. BENNET of New York." "The effort of my friend, though covertly designed, is the first show of their influence in this body. Again, on last Wednesday he showed his interest in the steamship companies by offering and securing the passage through this House of a joint resolution authorizing the admission of Fannie Diner, a pronounced idiot." "The strange feature about this case is that the gentleman from New York studiously concealed these facts from this House or this resolution would never have passed." "The gentleman has a perfect right to stand by the ship companies, but he has no right to abuse the confidence of this House by suppressing the truth in his effort to serve them. So completely was this House deceived that my friend Mr. GOLDFOGLE wanted to extend the resolution to cover all such cases and let in all idiots." "Again, on last Friday my friend, feeling that he had scored a point in the interest of the ship companies in relieving them of the embarrassing situation the Fannie Diner case had placed them, took the floor of this House in open opposition to restricting immigration, and in an argument evidently in the interests of the steamship companies, made to delude this House, finds himself in the midst of a mass of contradictions too patent to deceive anyone." "Turning to my friend's first speech, who, while trying to play both sides of this question;"

Resolved, That the above sentences be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rise to inquire how this gets to be a question of privilege with the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the matter is offensive to the gentleman from New York, it seems to me the gentleman from New York ought to attend to his own case.

The SPEAKER. The question is as to an alleged violation of the rules of the House, and it is the privilege of any Member, his duty, if it violates them, to call attention to it, and the gentleman has said that he offers the following resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, is it a question of the highest privilege or a question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is a question of the privileges of the House, as the Chair understands.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from Missouri that he withdraw the objection he has just made. The gentleman from Kentucky not alone attacked my friend and colleague [Mr. BENNET of New York], but went farther out of his way to make what I regard an attack on me. Had I been present in the House when the gentleman from Kentucky delivered that speech, filled with the meanest and most uncalled-for insinuations, I would have taken the floor and replied to the gentleman from Kentucky. I think that speech was one of the meanest and most unfair speeches ever delivered upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. After all, the resolution has been offered. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I simply want to make a request of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I see that my colleague is not in the House at present, and I ask, as a matter of courtesy to him, that this matter go over until he is here.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as a parliamentary inquiry, would this resolution be in order for consideration at any time, or must it be considered now to be considered at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, the resolution having been presented, the gentleman from Massachusetts being recognized, the matter is now before the House; but by unanimous consent, the matter might be postponed until a given time, or the House might dispose of it now that it has it up under consideration. The gentleman from Massachusetts would not be taken from the floor without his consent; by unanimous consent it could go over and be postponed, to be called up at a later time, or when anyone has the floor to make the motion it might be postponed to a day certain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would think, Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to make a suggestion—I do not care anything about the squabble one way or the other—ordinary fairness suggests the postponement until the Member who is supposed to have offended should be here. I do not see that the gentleman could lose anything.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Unless he had notice that it would be called to the attention of the House this morning.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Kentucky has had no notice.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am creditably informed that the gentleman was here not five minutes ago, and I scarcely think any postponement should be had on that account.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague had any notice or any intimation that such a matter as this was going to be brought before the House this morning, I would not ask that it go over; but it does seem to me that as a matter of common fairness and proper treatment toward a Member of the House he ought at least to have an opportunity to be present when a matter affecting him is to be considered by the House.

Mr. LACEY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the regular order. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to give my share of unanimous consent to an order that at 1 o'clock to-day, irrespective of any other business before this House, this matter shall come up, and that I shall have the floor for one hour, as if I had not been interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this resolution be postponed until 1 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And that at that time, irrespective of what other business is before the House, this matter shall come up, and I shall have the floor.

The SPEAKER. That would be equal to a direction that the Committee of the Whole should rise, if it should happen to be in session.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it competent to ask the House to instruct the committee?

The SPEAKER. Oh, entirely so. The House can make an order. As the Chair understands it, if unanimous consent is given at this time that would be equivalent to a direction to the Committee of the Whole to rise.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As the Chair understands it, at the time when the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived the Committee of the Whole, under this unanimous consent, must rise and the House resume its sitting immediately for the consideration of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent is given the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would have to direct the Committee of the Whole to rise at that time. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give me a half hour of his time? I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to make that request for an hour and a half.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall object, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts puts in a proviso that the gentleman from Kentucky is present or has had notice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know what the proposition is. It has been so noisy over here that I could not understand.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is for unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of this resolution until 1 o'clock to-day, and that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, if at that time it should be in session, shall then direct the committee to rise.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will fix a different time. I am very anxious to conclude the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and I hope the gentleman will consent to fixing it for a later hour. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have the right of way here for an hour and a half. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I shall not consent to its going over until to-morrow.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I object.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I call for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to object.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object, unless the gentleman from Kentucky is given notice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, as I said a few moments ago, these remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are clearly out of order in that they impute motives——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The House will please be in order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. The House will first be in order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FINLEY. I understood the gentleman from Georgia withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not yield. It seems impossible to arrive at a decision in this House which shall be satisfactory to everyone, and failing the necessary unanimous consent I do not care to lose this opportunity to say what I wish. I shall not speak against the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] who, in the excitement of the moment, may have said things that he should not——

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman may have said things that he did not altogether wish to say; but I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] should be and is entitled to have the House know what meritorious services he has rendered to the Committee on Immigration in perfecting the bill which I had the honor to report a few days ago.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] is very much interested in the question of the restriction of immigration. He is a stern restrictionist, and so am I; but the gentleman from Kentucky has allowed himself to be carried away by the fact that he is zealously interested in restriction into thinking that those who do not agree with him are perhaps actuated by improper motives. As a matter of fact, a speech which, more than any other that I have ever heard, represents the ideas of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] was a speech delivered by President Eliot, of Harvard University, before the immigration conference in New York. Yet no one would accuse President Eliot of being actuated by a desire to protect the interests of the steamship companies. Mr. Speaker, when you find a man coming out into the open, as the gentleman from New York has done; when you find a man openly opposing on the floor of this House a popular measure, you can make up your mind that that man is actuated by honest motives. If he were actuated by any such motives as were imputed to him by the gentleman from Kentucky he would be the last man to rise on the floor of the House and openly make his protest from time to time.

In the Committee on Immigration the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and I took exactly opposite positions. Nevertheless, I think I can call on every one of my Democratic colleagues on that committee—and I wish there were more of them here—to agree with me that never in their lives have they seen a fairer-minded, more intelligent, more faithful legislator than the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. Moreover, although the gentleman from New York did not agree to the main features of our bill, there was no one who more than the gentleman from New York did his very best to perfect each item, so that the committee could report a bill in proper shape and effective form. If provisions were reached in which he did not believe, he said, "Gentlemen, I do not believe in these items." We would ask him as a favor, he being the most acute-minded lawyer on that committee, to put such items in shape for us. He would do so; and I take pleasure in saying that to no one man on that committee more than to the gentleman from New York does this House owe the report of the immigration bill. Hour after hour he sat there and worked on the details, perfecting items with which he did not agree, with which he said he admitted that he did not agree, but pointing out to us the webs in which we had contrived to enmesh ourselves—pointing out to us the way to avoid these snares, in every way doing his duty as a legislator to perfect a bill to which he is manfully and openly opposed. The gentleman is not a restrictionist.

The gentleman takes the view of many high-minded humanitarians, that restriction is unfriendly to the rest of the human race. He is consistent in that position. He does not go from hole to corner, devising spokes to put in the way of our efforts toward getting this bill considered. On the contrary, he says:

> I shall do nothing to prevent the consideration of that bill. On the whole, I approve of its consideration, although in a general way I do not at all approve of the purposes of the bill.

Why, gentlemen, there are Members on this floor from my own State of Massachusetts—I will not say on which side of the House—who agree in every iota with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. The committee did not agree with him, they reported the bill; but I can say, as I think the gentleman from Alabama who worked on the subcommittee with us will say, how much we were impressed by the splendid qualities displayed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman from Kentucky, if he had consulted his colleagues on our committee, his colleagues on the Democratic side I mean, would have found that, without exception, they are of my opinion. If, before he unfortunately made them, he had submitted his remarks to any one of his colleagues, he would have been told that no man in the House less deserved his censure and obloquy than the gentleman from New York. Instead of consulting with those who knew the facts, prematurely and unwisely he made this unfortunate speech imputing motives to and holding up as a corrupt legislator a gentleman who, in my opinion, although he is a new Member and I know him but little, is one of the ablest men on the floor of this House to-day; one of the keenest minded lawyers, and one of the most capable legislators. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think it is but fair that my colleague from Kentucky should have an opportunity to be heard, if he desires, and also others.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I yield such time as he desires.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I was not present on the floor of the House at the time this discussion was precipitated and that I have not heard what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said. I hardly understand the manner of this procedure. The remarks which I made yesterday, and are copied in this resolution and are attempted to be expunged, were stated on the floor of the House, and there was no objection taken to them at the time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOPKINS. Most assuredly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that a part of the remarks printed in the RECORD this morning concerning me were not uttered on the floor of this House during the delivery of your speech?

Mr. HOPKINS. If I could be of any service to the gentleman, or if I have done him any injustice in what I regard as a friendly and more of a humorous reference to him than in any other way, I would gladly expunge it. If the gentleman is touchy about his age or marital relations, or touchy about the fact that he is willing or able to assimilate with these people about whom I have been talking, I would gladly withdraw that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In the gentleman's speech he says that my colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] deceived me. I want to say that my colleague from New York did not deceive me, and that the comments which the gentleman from Kentucky made concerning my friend from New York were unfairly made.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object to the gentleman from New York inserting a speech into my remarks, and I decline to yield any further. I would say to the gentleman that I think I was at least charitable to him when I said what I did about his reference to Mr. BENNET's resolution. I do not think if my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] had known the secret behind that resolution he would have made the remarks he did, and I think that if he will read the RECORD of that day he will find that he was duped into making the statements he made there unintentionally, and he would not have made them if he had had the truth before him.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand that the words be taken down in regard to the word "duped." I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, as to the other remarks about Mr. BENNET, they were not intended as any personal reflection upon his character. Gentlemen have a right to represent any interest they desire to represent upon this floor. They have a right to take any position which they want to take upon this floor, and I maintain, sir, that the positions taken by them and argued and presented to this House are subjects of criticism and subjects of argument as much as others presented in the language which I used yesterday. It was only presented, sirs, as argument upon my part to show that the gentleman was interested or that he was not in full favor with the idea of restrictive immigration as his committee had presented it and as his committee had reported it. It was simply what I understood to be a legal argument, a fair and a just argument, which I had a right to make upon this floor in answer to the one which he had thrust upon me, to show his purpose in doing so.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Most cheerfully.

Mr. BONYNGE. Does the gentleman say all of these extracts which have been quoted in the resolution were delivered by him upon the floor, or were they not afterwards printed in the RECORD and not delivered by you in your speech? I was listening to the speech at the time——

Mr. HOPKINS. The last, perhaps, I had not reached. The gentleman remembers there was an effort then to stop my mouth and take me off the floor and prevent me from saying what I had a right to say upon a question here, and I may have been denied the right to say what I desired to say, but I had this printed and had it before me to say if I had not been interrupted and taken off the floor at the time I was. The last statement may not have been reached, but the other statements were made by me upon the floor of this House.

Mr. BONYNGE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that all the statements except the last were made by him upon the floor of the House?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; they were made by me.

Mr. BONYNGE. My recollection does not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not question the gentleman's recollection or the gentleman's honesty either of his recollection or conviction, but I know what I did, sir, and I know that I made all these statements, perhaps except the last part.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the gentleman recall the Chair stated to him, after the interruption, that the time exhausted by the interruption had not been taken from the time which had been given the gentleman to speak?

Mr. HOPKINS. I remember that, and I think you are mistaken, too, sir. I was watching the clock, because I knew my time was limited, and although you said you would give me five minutes more for the time consumed while in the colloquy, I think you were mistaken and did not do it. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to violate any of the rules of decorum or any of the rules of order of this House, but as a Representative here I insist I had the right to make the statements which I made here as an argument and reason in support of the position which I had taken and in answer to the speeches which a gentleman, entirely uncalled for and without any reason, had thrust upon me on a former day when I was not present here to defend myself.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I would desire to ask the gentleman another question. How much time were you allowed for your remarks the other day?

Mr. HOPKINS. I was allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. BONYNGE. I find in the RECORD seven full pages of your speech.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BONYNGE. Does the gentleman contend that he delivered the seven full pages of speech during that time?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state to the gentleman I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in conformity with the custom here older than any Members of the House. It has been the rule of this House, and I wonder why it is this is the first time something has been said here that gentlemen are afraid to let go out to the country and be published before the great people of this country. I do not understand this; I do not understand why my speech should be culled, why my remarks should be garbled, and I not permitted to speak here as a Representative of the great people whom I do represent, the people who have been slandered, sir, by an effort that brought forth the effort on my part to defend them upon this floor. No; it is not strange the shoe pinches, and it must be gotten rid of. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire further recognition?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to consume some of his time now.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Forty-six minutes.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As there are a great many more Members in the House at present than when this altercation began, I desire again to read the preamble, if the House will give me its attention:

Whereas on the 10th day of April, 1906, in a speech printed this morning in the RECORD, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS], contrary to the law of the House, has embodied the following sentences:

A few days ago, Mr. BENNET of New York;

That statement is immaterial, although a violation of the law of the House, which requires that a Member shall be spoken of descriptively. The gentleman from Kentucky continues:

The effort of my friend, though covertly designed, is the first show of their influence in this body.

The text that preceded this remark shows that the gentleman referred to the steamship companies, because he quoted more or less accurately a remark of mine with regard to those same companies. The gentleman next refers to my colleague from New York, as follows:

Again, on last Wednesday he showed his interest in the steamship companies by offering and securing the passage through this House of a joint resolution authorizing the admission of Fannie Diner, a pronounced idiot.

By the way, the resolution was reported unanimously from the Committee on Immigration. Then the gentleman from Kentucky goes on——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will not yield to an interruption at present.

The strange feature about this case is that the gentleman from New York studiously concealed these facts from this House or this resolution would never have passed.

Further on he says:

The gentleman has a perfect right to stand by the ship companies, but he has no right to abuse the confidence of this House by suppressing the truth in his effort to serve them. So completely was this House deceived that my friend Mr. GOLDFOGLE wanted to extend the resolution to cover all such cases and let in all idiots.

Again, on last Friday my friend, feeling that he had scored a point in the interest of the ship companies in relieving them of the embarrassing situation in which the Fannie Diner case had placed them, took the floor of this House in open opposition to restricting immigration, and in an argument evidently in the interests of the steamship companies, made to delude this House, finds himself in the midst of a mass of contradictions too patent to deceive anyone.

Turning to my friend's first speech, who, while trying to play both sides of this question, etc.

Is there a man on the floor of this House that does not say that such language is thoroughly improper and should have been taken down at once?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield a minute to the gentleman from Kentucky if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not care to ask the gentleman a question now.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky on two occasions during the session of this Congress undertook to deliver speeches upon the immigration question, and while he attempted to so frame his remarks that it might be understood that he was opposed only to the admission of undesirable aliens, yet one reading his speeches could readily observe that through it there ran the spirit of a bigot and a know-nothing. I believe the sentiment of this House is opposed to that spirit, which on an occasion heretofore I pronounced un-American. I regret that such a spirit found its way——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's words are out of order, and I demand that they be taken down.

Mr. HOPKINS. I hope you will not do that on my behalf.

Mr. JAMES. I make it on behalf of myself.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am able to take care of myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the point of order is that he referred to the gentleman from Kentucky as a "bigot," and as the gentleman is very touchy about remarks on the floor, I call him to order myself, and not in behalf of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from New York will not indulge in personalities and will proceed in order. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, if I said anything that offended the sensibilities of the gentleman from Kentucky I cheerfully withdraw it. The spirit breathed through the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky was not in accord with the spirit that ought to pervade the great American House of Representatives. I regret that that spirit was manifested by anyone on the Democratic side of this Chamber, for if Democracy ever stands for anything it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is not discussing the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and his remarks are not germane to this motion to expunge. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I certainly have the right to say, Mr. Speaker, that I regret that the spirit to which I referred was interjected by one on the side of the Chamber where I sit. Mr. Speaker, I want to bear testimony to what was so well said by the gentleman from Massachusetts concerning my colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET]. I have had the pleasure of Mr. BENNET's acquaintanceship for a number of years. He served with honor upon the bench of one of the courts of New York. He is an excellent lawyer and a man of eminent fairness.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask if the gentleman will yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will, although the gentleman did not yield to me.

Mr. HOPKINS. I thought I had yielded all you wanted.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I wish to say that my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] never, to my knowledge or belief, said and never did an unfair thing in this House. He offered a resolution covering an individual case of an immigrant. Not having heard the resolution read, I asked that the resolution be again reported. That was done by unanimous consent. I then asked the gentleman from New York to yield to me for an inquiry, whether he did not believe that cases of the kind covered by his resolution should be generally covered by one joint resolution. The gentleman from New York replied to me, saying that that was not the resolution. By that reply he intended, no doubt, to say that the resolution covered but one case, and not the cases of immigrants generally. In what, then, did the gentleman from New York deceive me? In absolutely nothing. But, sir, I understand the spirit in which the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky were uttered. Anyone reading the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, which, by the way, was not fully delivered on the floor of this House, but part of which was merely printed in the RECORD, can not fail to understand that the gentleman from Kentucky meant that the people of New York City should believe that both my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] and I were in favor of the admission of every kind and description of immigrants. Sir, if the gentleman from Kentucky meant that that should go forth either to the city of New York or to the nation, I disclaim his unwarranted and uncalled-for imputation. I believe in the admission of good, healthy, desirable immigration. Both the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and I believe that the healthy, desirable immigrants who have come to our shores have helped to make this country great and strong; have aided to build a country of happy homes; have contributed largely to bring about and promote the prosperity of our God-blessed land—that prosperity of which we proudly boast and which this country so grandly enjoys to-day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a question for information. Is Fannie Diner an idiot; and if so, was she admitted into the United States under our immigration law?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I never heard that she was. I know nothing of the case. Mr. BENNET told me that it was a proper and legitimate case, a case that he had investigated and which the President of the United States and the Immigration Service believed should be covered by a special resolution of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But was she an idiot? It does not make any difference what the President or Congress did—if she was an idiot and admitted into this country.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I never heard of the case any more than did the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not know anything about it.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. I will ask him if it is not true that the certificate of the doctor who examined her certified that she was an idiot, and that certification is now of record in the office of the Commissioner-General of Immigration?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I say again that I know nothing of the case, never heard of the case until my friend Mr. BENNET brought it before this House, and Mr. BENNET made no statement on the floor of this House which was intended to deceive any Member of the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield for a question, Mr. Speaker? Does the gentleman favor admitting idiots? I ask him a fair question. I can not believe he does.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No; but I do not care to be interrupted further just now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, if you do not want to answer the question. I do not want to interrupt you. I did not hear your answer.

Mr. WALLACE. How about the murderer of McKinley?

Mr. JAMES. The question is, If, as a matter of fact, this Diner woman is an idiot, were you fooled, deceived, or duped? Did you know it, in other words?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No more than you, when you gave your consent, as did also the other Members of this House.

Mr. JAMES. Then you were deceived about it, were you not?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not see how I was deceived. Neither was the gentleman from Kentucky deceived. Both of us, as well as all the Members of this House present when the question came up, gave unanimous consent to the resolution.

Mr. JAMES. The question is that if she is an idiot then you were deceived.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that it is a defense in this House to impugn a motive, to say that the motive was justly impugned? Does that make the words impugning motives any more in order to contend that they were just and proper?

Mr. JAMES. Not at all; but there is this in this proposition you overlook: If a Member of the House comes and states that he understands the facts in a case, and he relates them, all the Members take that statement and act upon it——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I decline to yield for this discussion between the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Kentucky. My time is too limited.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, which is to allow to the gentleman from New York the two minutes which he has remaining.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Kentucky undertook to print in his speech—but was careful not to deliver it on the floor of this House, but simply to print it in his speech—a remark which properly interpreted would mean that I was willing that all foreigners, whether idiotic or not, should be generally admitted. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that in no remark uttered on this floor did I undertake to say that I was willing that any mentally unsound immigrants should come here.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is to be pardoned for failing to properly understanding the immigration question. He represents a district containing, I believe, some seventeen counties, and which, according to the last census, has within it only 396 foreign born. How, sir, can he properly comprehend the many questions involved in the immigration question or the conditions produced because of immigration in the localities in which the immigrants may settle? In the district represented by the gentleman from Kentucky there was, according to the last census, 17.5 per cent of illiteracy, although the gentleman from Kentucky was school commissioner and had the education of the youth in charge. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why, sir, in the great city of New York, made up of every kind and condition of men, in that great city in which people from every portion of the habitable globe find habitation, the illiteracy, according to the census, was about 5 per cent, and in that city we have thrived splendidly. We have made it the greatest, grandest city in all the world. [Applause.] We have never been afraid of the immigration classes there, for they have been well behaved; they have assimilated with the citizenship; they have been peaceful and law-abiding; they have been thrifty and industrious. If now and then we find an undesirable immigrant, if now and then we find one not law-abiding, surely because of exceptional cases the gentleman from Kentucky should not claim that immigration ought to be kept out of this country.

But I repeat that the gentleman from Kentucky necessarily fails to understand the great problems of immigration. How can the gentleman, however efficient he may have desired to be in the performance of his duty as a school commissioner, understand the great problem that now confronts the cities of the Union when charged, as he was, with the education of the people in his own district, that district presents a record of 17.5 per cent of illiteracy? My friend and colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] said it was about 30 per cent. In that he erred.

I have examined the census and find that the illiteracy in the gentleman's district was over 17 per cent. But I want to be fair to the gentleman from Kentucky. The other day he said to me—and in fairness I wish to repeat his statement—that his district is not quite so illiterate now. In other words, the fact appears that while the gentleman from Kenucky was school commissioner there was 17.5 per cent of illiteracy, but since the gentleman left that office and came to Congress the illiteracy has happily decreased. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this seems to me to be a case of a "tempest in a teapot" to a very large extent. Now, I sat very close to my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] when he delivered the speech, a part of which is complained of in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and I can state to the House, without the least doubt on my part, that in the main the remarks were made by him.

Now, as to whether these statements were in violation of the rules of the House or the general parliamentary regulations is a question which the House must determine. It would have been eminently proper, if there was a breach of the rules of the House, for some Member to have called attention to it at that time, but these statements went unchallenged then and have remained so until now.

I think it more than likely that in part these remarks are attributable to some general observations submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who was himself the author of this resolution. As I remember it, some days ago he made a very interesting talk before the House upon the subject of immigration, and in his remarks he referred—I can not quote his exact language, for it is not before me—but if I remember, he stated in a general way that the opposition to the bill restricting immigration would in all probability be found to come chiefly from these companies that were engaged in the transportation of those people from foreign countries to this country. Now, my colleague, in speaking of the alignment of Members in this body upon this great question, put the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] on the side of these great concerns that are interested in keeping up this steady flow of immigration to the United States. That, in substance, is all that his remarks mean.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is a member of the Committee on Immigration and reported the bill upon this subject. He drew the line between the friends and the foes of legislation upon this question. Those who are opposed to it, according to his statement, whether they have any kind of property interest in any steamship company or not, whether they represent them as attorneys or otherwise, whether they do not represent them at all, are necessarily arrayed on the same side upon which the companies are found in this great contest. That is all that my colleague from Kentucky meant to say, and in making that statement he was fully warranted by the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, whose utterances could be fairly construed to mean the same in a general way.

Now, coming to the Fannie Diner case—the resolution that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had passed through the House. I do not remember the circumstances of that case, and I do not remember when the resolution was before the House.

But I want no better witness in the case than the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE]. Mr. GOLDFOGLE stated a few moments ago that he refrained from objecting to the resolution upon the assurance of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] that the resolution was all right, and I have no doubt that every Member of this House who was present on that occasion did the very same thing. If I had been here and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had said it was all right, I would not have objected to it. I am sure every Member of this House who was present on that occasion extended that courtesy to the gentleman from New York. As a matter of fact, was it all right? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] charges that this girl, Fannie Diner, had been refused admission by the board because she was an idiot, and her admission would have been in plain violation of the law. He advises me that the records in the proper office show the truth of this charge. Had I known that she was an idiot and been present when unanimous consent was asked for the consideration of the resolution, I should have objected, and have no doubt that a hundred other Members of this House would have interposed an objection if they had known that fact. Now, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] knew that she was an idiot, and it is not denied that he did know it, and withheld that fact, purposely or not, it does not make any difference whether he intended to deceive the House (I acquit him of any purpose of that kind, so far as I am concerned), but if knowing that she was an idiot he failed to make that statement to the House, then the Members were induced to give unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution that otherwise they never would in all probability have given.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether in the course of his remarks, as a matter of fact, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] did mention the fact that this woman was a pronounced idiot?

Mr. JAMES. No, sir; I can answer that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am not qualified to answer that question myself. I have no recollection of the resolution.

Mr. JAMES. Here is the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will read from the RECORD which my colleague [Mr. JAMES] has handed me as a reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 132) permitting the waiving of the alien immigration law in the case of Fannie Diner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized to waive the provisions of 'An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States,' approved March 3, 1903, in the case of Fannie Diner, if, after investigation, he deem such waiver proper."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether this bill provides for more than one person?

Mr. BENNET of New York. One person.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I did not hear the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That only relates to one individual case, I believe.

Mr. BENNET of New York. One person.

Mr. FINLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this resolution?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Diner family is a German family which six or seven years ago consisted of a father and mother, three daughters, and a son. The son immigrated to the United States some time previous, and for more than ten years has been an American citizen. Some time after he left Germany his father, for business reasons, took the family into Russia. Some time after that one of the daughters came here, making the son and daughter residents of America.

Mr. FINLEY. This is simply to permit the balance of the family to join the son and daughter, who are American citizens?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not think that the joint resolution ought to cover all cases of that kind. There are many such cases, and I am sure the gentleman from New York will join me in an expression of opinion that these cases ought to be covered generally by resolution, and that we ought not to pick out any one individual case.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will simply say that that is not the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNET of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a case in which it was alleged by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] that the application for entrance into the United States had been rejected by the board that is authorized to reject immigrants. I understand from him that there is a certificate on file in the proper office showing that rejection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] came before the House with a resolution authorizing this alleged idiot to be admitted to the ports of the United States. He was asked by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], "What is the necessity for this resolution?" Did he say it was because she was an idiot and could not be admitted under existing law? That was the real reason for the adoption of the resolution, and why did he not state it plainly and frankly? He chose rather to state facts which, if true, did not manifest any necessity whatever for the adoption of the resolution; and I want to call attention to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] had to say in that connection:

I will ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not think that the joint resolution ought to cover all cases of that kind?

Now, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] had known or had had an intimation that this Diner girl was an idiot, would he have put such a question as that to his colleague from New York? If he did not know it, when in truth it was and is a fact then known to his colleague in charge of the resolution, I want to know if the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] was not himself deceived by the withholding of such information by his colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET]?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Has not the gentleman from Kentucky overlooked the fact that his colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] alleges that my friend from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] wanted to extend the resolution to cover all such cases, and let in all idiots?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, I have just read from the RECORD showing that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] did want to make the resolution cover all such cases.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What cases?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Cases like that of Fannie Diner. Was there any statement made that she was an idiot?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No, sir. Was not the statement of Mr. HOPKINS against myself most unjust and unfair?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not think so, though that aspect of the matter is not now under consideration.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But now the gentleman from New York himself [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] can not help but admit that he was deceived if in fact this girl was an idiot, and I call upon him to stand up in the presence of this House and say whether, in the light of to-day's developments, she was not in truth an idiot, and whether he was not deceived by his colleague's [Mr. BENNET] course upon that occasion.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Did you not give the same consent that I gave and that the Speaker gave?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If so, I did it because the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] did not state the facts within his knowledge touching the case, and hence I was not informed that she was an idiot. But that the Speaker was not advised of the facts, if such was the case, and that I was not made aware of them can not excuse the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] if he had had any information that Fannie Diner was an idiot would the gentleman have made the remark about admitting all people of a similar class?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Personally I did not and do not know she is an idiot, and second——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg your pardon, you have not answered my question. If the gentleman from New York had known what presumably his colleague from New York did know, to wit, that Fannie Diner was an idiot, would he have made the remark about admitting all people of similar character?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I would not. I would have objected to the resolution [loud applause], and I deny the implication made in the statement that presumably my colleague from New York knew she was an idiot.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word. I did not make that implication. The record makes it. When a gentleman appears upon the floor of this House with a bill in his charge, he is presumed, by the ordinary course of common procedure, to know the character and nature of the person concerning whom the bill deals.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No question about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill was about Fannie Diner. Now, it is presumed in the ordinary course of human nature that the gentleman from New York, your colleague, knew who Fannie Diner was—knew about Fannie Diner—or else if the gentleman from New York did not know that, it is to be presumed that he was showing himself to the country in the attitude of a man who was the father of a bill for the benefit of somebody about whom he knew nothing.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it was stated in the committee, I am informed, she was an idiot.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] told the whole story in committee. I propose to yield time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] in a few minutes to advise this House of the true facts relative to Fannie Diner. Mr. Speaker, this discussion is proceeding on an entirely wrong basis about Fannie Diner.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair was not giving attention at the time the gentleman from Massachusetts addressed the Chair. Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make the obvious point of order that can be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that my remarks upon this particular phase of the question are subject to any point of order. If the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] were warranted by the facts in the case, then he had a right to charge that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had deceived the House by withholding information in his possession. As was well said by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], it is to be presumed that any Member of this body offering a resolution or a bill for the benefit of one of his constituents or any person knows all the circumstances in the case.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The many pension bills you have so generously offered in this House, were they such that you knew all about the individual?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am very glad to have the gentleman ask me that question. I have never asked the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions to consider a bill that I did not either know in person about or bring to that committee affidavits showing the facts about it. [Applause.] That is my rule, invariably observed in the almost ten years that I have served in this body. And so, on any other question, I have never called on this House to act upon any bill about which I could not give it all the facts in detail and verify them by sworn statements of witnesses. So, I hold that no Member ought to come before this body and ask it to enact legislation based upon a certain state of facts, unless he really believes, after proper effort to inform himself, that such facts can be substantiated by good and true testimony.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said a good deal more upon this question than I intended to say. I have only this to say in conclusion, that if in some particulars my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] seems to have transgressed the rules of this honorable body, I am sure there has been no real infraction that warrants this proceeding, and I have no apologies to make for him, because I am here to testify to his absolute honesty of purpose, his integrity of thought, his courage of expression, and his willingness to meet his opponents upon their own terms. He never utters that which he does not believe to be absolutely true; and if plain spoken, he always hews to the line, though perhaps not in quite as elegant language as some other gentlemen may do. In this instance he uttered that which he no doubt believed to be true, and having done that, he stands ready to abide the decision of this honorable body. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRUMPACKER). The gentleman has twenty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts has eighteen minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to my colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] I wish to make a brief statement in regard to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] in his speech the other day. In that speech he implied that my colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] was acting as the representative of steamship companies, and he said he was informed that a majority of the people engaged in the steamship business in New York resided in the district of my colleague. When I heard that statement, I remarked to my colleague that that was a curious statement, as I thought most of those gentlemen engaged in that business resided in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. OLCOTT] and in the district represented by myself.

There is only one steamship man that I know of who resides in the district of my colleague, Mr. BENNET. He represents one of the Italian steamship lines. The representative of the Cunard Line lives either in my district or in the district of my colleague, Mr. OLCOTT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question just for information? I did not catch what he said. Who was it that he said represented a steamship line?

Mr. PARSONS. I said that the only steamship representative that I knew of who lived in the district of my colleague [Mr. BENNET] represented one of the Italian lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Who was that?

Mr. PARSONS. That is a Mr. Hartfield. The representative of the Cunard Line lives, I think, in my district. The representative of the Hamburg-American Line lives in my district.

Fannie Diner came on the steamship Westernland from Antwerp. She did not come on one of the steamers of the Italian line. She came on one of the steamers of the Red Star Line, which belongs to the International Mercantile Marine. My impression is that the representative of that line lives in my district and not in the district of my colleague [Mr. BENNET of New York]. The views of my colleague [Mr. BENNET of New York] on the matters of immigration are not new. He and I have discussed them in public in New York, and he has long held views against the restriction of immigration.

Now, the facts in the case of Fannie Diner I believe to be these: I was not here the day the resolution was passed, but I had heard of her case before she arrived. Her brother came to this country many years ago, became an American citizen, and prospered. He is amply able to take care of all the other members of the family. He resides in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. BENNET of New York]. When Diner's mother and sister, including Fannie Diner, were on the way to this country, he feared there might be trouble about her admission because she was a mute and in feeble health. I was somewhat instrumental in seeing that he had an opportunity to meet them so as to see that they were not put to any unnecessary trouble, although it was certain that they would be carefully examined by the immigration authorities.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARSONS. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that Mr. BENNET stated to the committee that this girl was an idiot, and that when he came on the floor of this House he failed to give that information to the House?

Mr. PARSONS. I do not know whether he stated it to the committee, but I presume, knowing Mr. BENNET as I do, that he did.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can answer the gentleman's question. As I recollect it, the statement of Mr. BENNET of New York in the committee was that the woman was a mute and had been adjudged an imbecile by an officer of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. That is my recollection of his statement.

Mr. JAMES. That is a parliamentary way of saying that she was an idiot.

Mr. PARSONS. When the resolution in regard to Fannie Diner was before this House it was evident to anyone by the way the resolution was worded that if she was admitted without this special act of Congress the immigration law would be violated.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. PARSONS. No one asked my colleague why she could not be admitted under the immigration laws. Every question that was asked him he answered. The question asked him was, "What was the object of the resolution?" not why she could not be admitted under the immigration law; and he answered the question as to what the object was. Now, it may be a great sin to admit to this country even an imbecile, but the facts in this case were that they were refugees from Russia. As I understand it, their house had been burned over their heads and the brother was amply able to take care of this sister.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state what was the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It was the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. PARSONS. The resolution waived the immigration law in her case. So far as those who represent the city of New York are concerned, I undertake to say that we think this was an extremely proper case in which to waive the immigration law. The only reason for not waiving it would be that she might become a public charge. But there was no chance that she would become a public charge.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PARSONS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman the direct question, Was not the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asked the direct question by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] what was the necessity for the passage of that resolution, and was it not the duty of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], if he knew that the girl was an idiot, to so state it to the House?

Mr. PARSONS. I do not consider that it was his duty to so state. What the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] stated was that the object of the resolution was to enable her to come in together with the other members of her family.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That was not stating the necessity for it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives: A good deal of the legislation of this body takes place on honor. A great deal of legislation takes place by unanimous consent under our present rules. I feel very much concerned in this particular case on that account. It is the duty of the Speaker first to grant consent for recognition; it is the duty of the minority leader afterwards to grant consent upon the floor for unanimous legislation. Neither the Speaker nor the minority leader can proceed for twenty-four hours except upon the supposition that gentlemen father the bills before the House upon honor in their statements when they present themselves in advocacy of their respective bills requesting unanimous consent. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not in sympathy with the views of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] on the question of immigration. [Applause.] I am not afraid of white men coming to the United States, no matter how ignorant they are, provided they are honest and provided they want to work for a living in the United States. [Applause.] So, in the present controversy, I have no bias upon the side of the gentleman from Kentucky in the issue between the two. I am also not in sympathy with the views of the gentleman from New York altogether. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point presented before this House is this: Was this House or was it not deceived by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that that is not the question at issue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the question at issue is to strike out certain utterances of the gentleman from Kentucky which allege——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Which are unparliamentary.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). Which allege that the gentleman from New York had deceived the House. Now, back of that question comes the question, Did the gentleman from New York deceive the House or not?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not argue the point of order, but leave it to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not catch just what the gentleman said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said the question before this House now upon ultimate analysis was this: Whether or not the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] did or did not deceive the House in getting unanimous consent for the passage of this resolution?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I again raise the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the resolution, which objects to language because it is unparliamentary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say in reply to the point of order that the remarks to which the gentleman objected, made by the gentleman from Mississippi, are not of themselves, from a parliamentary standpoint, objectionable. As to what may be the opinion of the gentleman from Mississippi as to what is involved in the controversy the Chair can not rule as to its wisdom or unwisdom. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, there are two forms of deception known to the world—one affirmative and the other negative, one of words consisting of words uttered and the other of words repressed and not uttered when they ought to be uttered. My colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] seems to have misunderstood this question. There is nothing in this resolution on either side that reflects upon him. In answer to my question he said that if he had known what Mr. BENNET knew—what Mr. BENNET did know—to wit, that this woman was a confirmed idiot, and therefore was denied admission into the United States by the immigration laws of the United States, he would not have moved the general resolution that he did to admit all such persons.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the gentleman is making another "point of order."

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; he desires to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, then, I will answer it after I have finished this sentence. Now, Mr. Speaker, I affirm that before the committee—and I call upon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to confirm what I affirm—that before the committee the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] stated that this woman was a confirmed idiot, and when this bill came before the House and he was asked to explain the necessity of the bill and make a statement, by silence, which is the worst form of deception—by suppressing a fact which he knew—he did not communicate that fact to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when I interrupted the gentleman I was about to ask him what authority he had for saying Mr. BENNET knew that Fannie Diner was a confirmed idiot?

Mr. WILLIAMS. His own testimony before the committee; his own statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to finish my question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course; the gentleman asked me that question and I answered it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I said I was about to ask him that if he had not quoted the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], but now I ask him whether it is not an evidence of the perfect good faith on the part of the gentleman from New York that he did, if he did, as alleged, make that statement before the committee, and, therefore, if the committee unanimously thought that this woman, in spite of the fact she was a confirmed idiot, should be admitted into the United States, was not his answer to the gentleman from South Carolina sufficient?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had disclosed the truth about that case on this floor, as the record, as I understand it, does disclose, he might or he might not have gotten the unanimous consent of the House to pass his bill. The fact that he did disclose it before the committee and still got a unanimous report from the committee is an argument showing that he might possibly have gotten unanimous consent of the House; but the fact remains, none the less, that before the committee he made a statement showing he had knowledge of the fact under which, or in accordance with which, this woman was not entitled under the law to admittance to the United States, and before this House in committee afterwards he remained silent about that fact.

The House was entitled to know it, so that somebody—perhaps not myself—could have objected, if they had desired to do so. I repeat that, in matters by unanimous consent, we are on honor with one another upon this floor. The gentleman tries to hide behind the plea made by the false witness—before the court when he has sworn to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," excuses himself for not having told the whole truth by saying: "I was not asked the particular question that would have brought out the whole case." [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, in justification of the action of the committee as much as anything else, when that resolution was before the committee, it was a resolution proposing to allow either the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or the Commissioner-General of Immigration, I am not sure which, authority, in his discretion in all such cases, to suspend the law. The committee thought that that should not be done, that that was unwise. A statement was made by the gentleman from New York as to the hardships of this particular case; and my recollection was that the gentleman conceded the woman was an idiot, and if she was returned to her home country she would be shot in Russia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If he made that statement on this floor, and if I had been satisfied of the truth of it, I might not have refused unanimous consent, but I had a right to know it, and every Member of this House had a right to know it.

Mr. Speaker, in this one minute more I want to say this: This is not the first exploit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] in his attempt to invoke the partisan majority of this House to take part in the debate between him and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS]. The other day he did not seem to know the difference between a statement to the effect that a statement was untrue and that a statement was a lie. There is an immense difference between a statement that is pronounced incorrect, because not founded in fact, and in another case where it is pronounced not only incorrect but not well founded in subjective appreciation of fact. He made an effort then, when he knew it was not well founded in fact to invoke a partisan majority to overwhelm the gentleman from Kentucky, and now again to-day he is trying to work up a partisan majority to help him to get the best of the debate between him and the gentleman from Kentucky here. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry indeed to hear the gentleman from Mississippi indulge in such unjust language about a Member of this House. Of my own accord, with no suggestion from the gentleman from New York, I went to him and asked his permission, in justice to him and in recognition of his splendid work on our committee, which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] can testify to—I went to him and asked his permission to call the attention of the House to this language of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But he consented?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Of course he consented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course he did.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to this much discussed resolution. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had been making the best argument for his case, instead of trying to expedite things, as you know that we all do in cases of unanimous consent, he would have called attention to the resolution itself, which says:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, if after investigation he thinks fit—

May in that case—

admit Fannie Diner.

And having brought that out, it would have been the strongest argument possible. Undoubtedly unanimous consent would have been granted. So far as the attitude of the minority leader is concerned in these matters of unanimous consent, where was he when this bill came up? Where were those other safeguards on your side of the House? Not one man on your side of the House, or for that matter on mine, asked the question as to whether or not——

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; I will not yield to an interruption, because I want the House to understand this: Not one man asked the question of the gentleman from New York as to whether or not the bill had been favorably reported from his committee. That was an obvious question for you guardians to ask. If anyone had asked the gentleman from New York as to whether or not he had a favorable report from his committee he would have said yes, and unanimous consent would have been granted. He had every reason to believe that the unanimous report of his committee was a sufficient indication that the bill was properly safeguarded, in view of the fact that the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor was made a prerequisite for the admission of this woman.

It is impossible to defend the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky in this debate. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Massachusetts has just charged that we did not attend to our duty on this side of the House by asking the right questions. We did. The question was asked. This was or is the question:

What is the necessity for this resolution?

That was the question. What ought to have been the answer of the gentleman from New York? It ought to have been this: "She is a pronounced, a condemned, a confirmed idiot, and the statute of the United States, with unelastic rigor, prohibits the admission of idiots to our shores."

What was his real answer? His answer deceived the House, and but for his answer there might or might not have been objections. I do not undertake to say. But instead of making that reply, which the truth and the whole truth demanded, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] made the reply, in substance, that "a part of her family was over here." Not a word about idiocy. What was his answer? Read the RECORD. Hear it:

Mr. Speaker, the Diner family is a German family—

That appealed, of course, to our sympathies—which six or seven years ago consisted of a father and mother, three daughters, and a son. The son immigrated to the United States some time previous, and for more than ten years has been an American citizen.

That was the reason that he gave for the necessity of the legislation.

Some time after he left Germany his father, for business reasons, took the family into Russia.

And we all know Russians are hard on Jews, and that was another appeal to our sympathy. How cunning it all is. Mr. HOPKINS used the word "covertly." Was there ever a word better used, or better adapted to an occasion? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some time after that one of the daughters came here, making the son and daughter residents of America.

We did our duty; we asked the question that ought to have brought out the truth and the whole truth, and we did not get the whole truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in my own time I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to tell this House if he believes that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] withheld that information with the purpose of deceiving this House?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if I answered that question, somebody would take down my words and make a point of order on me. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may make merry about the reputation of a fellow-Member. It is a very serious——

Mr. WILLIAMS. No question of his reputation is involved at all—just a question of what he has done and refrained from doing is now before this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Gentlemen may make merry over the question of the reputation of a fellow-Member, and they may shield themselves behind the danger of having their words taken down; but when they are asked a plain question as man to man, do you or do you not, sir, believe that the gentleman from New York intentionally concealed from the House a fact which you think is material? I ask for an answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before I answer the question I ask unanimous consent that my reply may not be taken down, and that I may not be called to order, and that the rules about parliamentary language may be suspended.

Mr. WALDO. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Objection is made. Therefore I can not answer.

Mr. WALDO. I want him to go down on the record in what he says.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this incident——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I demand order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can wait as long as the House can wait. Gentlemen will be seated and please be in order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I regret that this incident has arisen in the history of the House. It is very common in the course of debate here for gentlemen upon either side, and all kinds of gentlemen, to use expressions which, if they were to take the time to reflect upon the particular expressions and the particular subjects-matter, probably would not be used. There is a large amount of humanity in this body, and it manifests itself in a great many different ways and upon a great many different occasions. I happen to be personally acquainted with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] and he is properly characterized when he is spoken of as a gentleman. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], but I am quite ready to concede that the same term "gentleman" also describes and properly characterizes him. It seems that these two gentlemen had some controversy—that is, the one made a speech and the other made a speech, and each thought that in the course of the remarks of the other he was spoken of in a way that was improper and too harsh. It is not worth while, in the short time at my disposal, to go into the question about who was right or wrong, how far either was right, or how far either was wrong. We have now come to the grave situation when another gentleman has seen proper to offer a resolution to strike out of the RECORD a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky.

By way of showing how thoughtless sometimes the most thoughtful of us are, and how indiscreet sometimes the most discreet of us are, I will read to the House from some remarks which the same gentleman who offered this resolution, in speaking upon the immigration bill, I believe, some time ago, on March 7, delivered in this House, and which appear in the RECORD of the 12th of March. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] on that occasion, among other things, said:

We can exclude a few thousand by selective measures, but if we really want restrictive measures and seriously desire to cut down our immigration, we have got a fight on our hands, and it is none too soon to begin. We shall be fought at every stage. The steamship companies and the large transportation lines might put up a mock battle against some of these unimportant selective bills, with a view to keeping us as long as possible at the soup before we get at the meat, but if we try to get a real restrictive measure through Congress we shall have every transportation line and every steamship line trying to stop us, and it will not be any sham battle. I for one would rather see a real restrictive bill reported to this House and beaten than pass half a dozen of those little, unimportant selective bills, which merely tend to raise the qualifications of a few thousand people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I know in looking over the directory, which I consulted hastily that I might not be in error about the matter, it does not appear that the steamship companies are directly represented in the House. In other words, I do not find any particular steamship district or any particular transportation company constituency. Now, I am wondering how this serious battle and these permanent obstacles confront us. The steamship companies are not here; there are no constituencies set aside by legislation or referred to in the Constitution as steamship or transportation constituencies.

So, having it all our own way in the House, and having it all the Senators' own way in the Senate, how are we going to have all this trouble in passing these proper wholesale restrictive measures? Must I be driven to the conclusion that the gentleman from Massachusetts had in mind when he uttered those words which I just read, something not found here, but the possibility, the fear, the feeling of dread that somehow, in some manner, through some agency, the steamship opposition and the transportation opposition would find voice and votes here? It is true that nobody was identified and nobody referred to as the person who would be the spokesman, who would be the agent, the minion of the steamship transportation company——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. DE ARMOND. It is true nobody is identified, but I take it that somebodies must have been referred to, and that the whole body is reached by the reference. Taking that as a conclusion, here is the gentleman from Massachusetts, who offers this resolution, saying generally in the House that somehow or other, by some agency or other, through some means or other, the steamship companies here and at the other end of the Capitol are going to put up a tremendous fight—no sham battle, but a serious warfare will be on—if anything of consequence is to be done.

One of the objects I have in view in addressing myself to this question is to get at the meaning of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and find out whether or not it would not be well for him to enlarge his resolution and strike from his own speech the part which I have just read to the House. If he does not mean that many here are going to interpose that opposition, then he ought to strike out on the ground that it is irrelevant, or if not irrelevant absolutely nonsensical. I presume it is not nonsensical, and do not imply that it is. It can only be relevant if many members here and at the other end of the Capitol are friends of the transportation companies, and if the companies can operate through them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I was going to say that if the gentleman objected to these remarks in my speech and moved to strike them out I do not object.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; I am not so great a purist that I take up the time of the House in motions to strike out remarks of a kind made frequently by the best of men on the floor of the House. I am one who recognizes that in the heat of debate, in the fluent flow of speech, many men say a great many things which, if they were sitting down and carefully considering, perhaps they would not say.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Perhaps the gentleman is not aware that the gentleman from Kentucky read from manuscript.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; I am aware of that, but I am not aware, however, that he dwelt with the minute particularity, with the microscopic power of scrutiny and purification, which the gentleman from Massachusetts evidently gave to these particular words. [Laughter.]

I am aware of another thing. I am aware of the fact that in the course of the purification debate on this resolution things one hundred fold more severe, things deserving one hundred fold more condemnation than anything in the language now subject to criticism, if it deserves criticism, have been uttered. In other words, in order to wipe out a few words there have been floods of words uttered in this debate which directly and by insinuation carry far more objectionable meaning than anything that can be found in the language sought to be stricken out. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now yield whatever time remains to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to disclaim any intent whatever of intending to reflect any discredit upon my friend Mr. GOLDFOGLE, of New York, in the remarks which I made about him day before yesterday. I stated it, as I said before, purely in a humorous way, purely to make a little fun out of the remark he made, and I now disclaim and desire to withdraw any statement I made there that would in any way embarrass him before the country or before this House, although he has just been pretty severe on me. As to my friend, Mr. BENNET, I can not say so much, for, sir, after two hours of debate here I am only more convinced that the statements I made were the reasonable and natural deductions of his conduct, and that I was right in making them.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to say to the gentleman, in the opinion of the Chair, his remarks are not in order under the rules of the House, and the gentleman will please proceed in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object to his proceeding. The rule is he can not unless he has the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from New York made the point of order. The Chair in what he stated exercised his duty as seemed to him to be proper as Speaker of the House, but the Chair understands the gentleman now makes the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I do make the point of order, and I insist the gentleman shall not be permitted to speak, having violated the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please take his seat and await the pleasure of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Kentucky may proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed in order.

Mr. PAYNE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HINSHAW. I object.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now move that my colleague from Kentucky may proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that his colleague may proceed in order.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division, Mr. Speaker!

The House proceeded to divide, when the request was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, one statement which I felt I was especially called upon to answer was the charge of illiteracy, the charge of ignorance against the people whom I have the honor to represent. The gentleman made a statement in his former speech that 30.6 per cent of those people were illiterate and ignorant. He is met by my friend [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] this morning with a statement that that is not true and that the per cent is but 17 per cent, which I again refute and say is not true. Does the gentleman know the fact that you have been forced to come to my country, where you say so much ignorance exists, to get teachers to go in your New York schools and train and instruct your children? That is true to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As to the Fannie Diner case, Mr. Speaker, I stated upon the floor simply what the Commissioner-General of Immigration said to me——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not yield.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will you answer one question? I yielded to you.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not the time. As to the Fannie Diner case, I simply quoted what the highest official in the immigration department of the country said to me, that she was a blank idiot; that she shrunk from the light, which indicated that she had been kept in darkness; that she had sores upon her legs, which indicated that she had been manacled; that she had claws, which showed she had not been kept, and further, she did not eat with her hands, but she thrust her face into the plate and ate in this manner.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no excuse for this controversy; and in conclusion I want to say that I am not surprised at the result of it. I know that gentlemen are growing anxious about the stirring of public sentiment on the outside. I know that some gentlemen here would rather not have the truth told. They would rather that the country would not be advised upon this subject. Do you know that there is a lurking, secret sentiment all through this country that is to-day rising in its might against the inflow of immigration that is coming to this country, a voice that is speaking in many ways; and you gentlemen who would throttle the truth upon the subject, you gentlemen who would leave the doors of this country wide open, not only for the undesirable who come of their own accord, but to those who are brought in violation of law, will feel the power and influence of the workingmen of this country, who are confronted with the condition which threatens their homes. They are here to-day. They sit in the galleries looking down upon you. They are taking notice of every word that is said, and they know who are their friends and who are their enemies, and this is dodging behind the proposition to keep their records from going before the country. Mr. Speaker, what I have said, as I said before, I believe I had a right to say. It was but a fair deduction from facts which have not been denied. I said it then; I will not withdraw it, and so far as the House is concerned, if you so desire, you have the power to expunge it from the RECORD. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes of that to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. I rise simply to call the attention of the House to the question before us. It is a question in which every individual Member of this House, without respect to whether he be Democrat or Republican, is vitally interested. The gentleman from Massachusetts arose this morning and raised a question involving the privilege of this House; not the privilege of any individual Member; not the privilege of the gentleman from New York; not the privilege of the gentleman from Kentucky, but the privilege of the House of Representatives. He sent to the Clerk's desk and had read extracts from a speech made by the gentleman from Kentucky several days ago, in which he impugned the motives of the gentleman from New York, and offered a resolution that they be stricken from the RECORD. That presents the question before the House. There can be no doubt but that what the gentleman from Kentucky said was in violation of the propriety of debate, an insult to the dignity of this House, an express infraction of its rules. The question presented to the House, therefore, is whether or not it will enforce its own rules. I repeat, the question does not involve the interest of any individual or individuals, but in the interest of all.

Now, instead of meeting that question fairly, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I may say on this side also, have indulged in criticisms of the conduct of the gentleman from New York, and of the conduct of the gentleman from Kentucky. Amongst other things, the gentleman from Mississippi has taken occasion to say that he is not in favor of immigration. In other words, he has taken occasion to air his views upon that subject in this controversy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. I have unconsciously misquoted the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, obviously.

Mr. DALZELL. He said he agreed with the gentleman from New York, while he did not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon again; unconsciously he again inaccurately quotes me. I said I did not agree.

Mr. DALZELL. It is not of the remotest consequence. I was simply going to call attention to it to show that every question had been discussed except the real question now before the House. I care not how much time was spent by friends of the gentleman from Kentucky and friends of the gentleman from New York in supporting their individual friends. What I do care for is that it remained for the gentleman from Mississippi to impugn, by insinuation, the motives of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Mississippi has been guilty, in an insinuating way, of precisely the same crime and the same violation of the rules as was the gentleman from Kentucky. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I care nothing about the merits of the proposition as to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] said or did on the floor of this House on the occasion in question. It has no relevancy to the question that we are now discussing. But let me say this: It is a conceded fact that all the information that the gentleman from New York had in respect to this particular case he disclosed to the whole Committee on Immigration. He left that committee in session; he came up to the floor of this House and asked unanimous consent for the passage of the resolution referred to. A fair reading of the RECORD will show that he was going on to make a full statement of the case when he was interrupted by the gentleman from South Carolina, and there is nothing in the RECORD to show that the gentleman from New York had any intention to suppress or misrepresent anything. Aside, however, from this controversy the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Kentucky have overshot the mark. They have gone a little too far; they have given away their own case, because both of them confess that if the gentleman from New York had stated on the floor of this House what the gentleman from Mississippi now says he ought to have stated, they both would have joined in asking unanimous consent. [Applause.]

It remained, I say, for the gentleman from Mississippi to endeavor to rally his followers upon a question involving the dignity and honor of this House and the proprieties of debate to make this a partisan question; to insinuate what the gentleman from Kentucky had the courage to assert, and what the gentleman from Mississippi had not the courage to assert, because when questioned he said he would not, unless exempted from risk of censure by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to an interruption?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the thing which the gentleman from Mississippi had not the courage to assert?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Mississippi insinuated that the gentleman from New York had been guilty of the conduct charged against him by the gentleman from Kentucky, and when asked the question whether he believed that he had or had not been guilty of that conduct, he declined to answer, unless exempted from censure under the rules of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The SPEAKER. The time of all gentlemen has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. On this resolution I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 91, answered "present" 9, not voting 117, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1906.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday a provision was accepted by the committee to which I desire briefly to call attention. For the information of the committee I shall read the provision to which I refer:

And the Postmaster-General shall require a record from July 1 to December 31, 1906, of all second-class mail matter received for free distribution, and also at the 1 cent a pound rate, so as to show the weights in pounds, respectively by classes, of daily newspapers, weekly and other than daily newspapers, magazines, scientific periodicals, educational periodicals, religious periodicals, trade-journal periodicals, agricultural periodicals, miscellaneous periodicals, and sample copies of said newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, and make report to Congress of such information by February 1, 1907, together with an estimate of the average length of haul of said respective classes above named. And the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to cover the expense of compiling such information.

It may be that the value of this legislation is not apparent to many Members. To me it is of very great importance.

On January 15 last I introduced a bill to reclassify domestic mail matter and to rearrange the rates of postage thereon.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to classify domestic mail matter and to fix the rates of postage thereon.

Be it enacted, etc., That domestic mail matter shall include all matter deposited in the mails for local delivery or transmission from one place to another within the United States, and between the United States and its possessions, which matter is now mailable under the law, and shall consist of two classes, to be known, respectively, as the first and the second class.

SEC. 2. That first-class mail matter shall consist of written and sealed matter, postal cards, and private mailing cards, as defined and determined by the postal laws, regulations, and rulings now in force.

SEC. 3. That second-class mail matter shall consist of all mailable matter not included within the first class.

SEC. 4. That all mail matter of the first class shall be subject to a postal charge at the following rates: On postal cards and on private mailing cards (post cards) conforming to the requirements of section 418, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1 cent each; on all other mailable matter of the first class, 1 cent an ounce or fraction thereof.

SEC. 5. That all mail matter of the second class shall be subject to a postal charge at the rate of 1 cent for each 3 ounces or fraction thereof.

SEC. 6. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. Chairman, as appears from the bill itself, it is intended to divide all domestic mail matter into two classes. The first class is to consist of all mail matter which under existing laws and regulations is considered as first-class matter, and all other mail matter is to be considered as second-class matter.

The rate on first-class mail matter is fixed at 1 cent for 2 ounces or fraction thereof, instead of the present rate of 2 cents, and the rate of second-class matter is fixed at 1 cent for each 3 ounces or fraction thereof. The purposes to be accomplished are to have 1-cent postage for first-class matter, and to compel all other classes of mail matter to pay at least somewhat near the cost of handling.

For many years the Post-Office Department has complained of the great burden the second-class mail is to the postal revenues. It is difficult, if not almost impossible, to ascertain the exact cost of handling such mail beyond the revenue it yields. Yet sufficient is known to demonstrate that the resources of the Post-Office Department are almost entirely absorbed in an effort to handle properly the second-class mail.

The total estimated weight of mail for the fiscal year 1905, excluding Government free matter, was 912,000,000 pounds, and the estimated postage paid upon the part thereof that was subject to postage was about $137,000,000. I am giving the figures roughly, Mr. Chairman, and they are sufficiently close for the purposes of this statement. Second-class mail matter constituted about 67 per cent of all mails by weight, excluding Government free matter, and 70 per cent of the total bulk weight of the mails. The revenue it yielded was $5,697,198.19, or about 4 per cent of the total amount received from postage.

First-class matter—letter mail—yields about 78 per cent of the postage revenue, third-class mail about 14 per cent, and fourth-class about 4 per cent.

There are practically six different rates of postage for second-class matter; some is carried at 1 cent a pound rates, some is free, and some is subject to certain regulations that make it almost impossible either to determine what the peculiar matter should pay, or whether it is entitled to be entered as second-class matter.

To give some slight idea of the manner in which the facilities of the Post-Office Department are occupied by the second-class matter it is only necessary to say that last year 618,664,754 pounds of paid second-class matter was handled, which was an increase of 48,994,935 pounds over the preceding year.

While some of it is handled free and some at the rate of 1 cent a pound the Post-Office Department estimates that it costs from 5 to 8 cents a pound to handle the matter.

Year after year, Mr. Chairman, futile efforts are made to effect certain improvements in the postal service; and year after year Congress is face to face with a deficit in the postal revenues. It is conceded that many reforms should be effected in the service if the means were available. For instance, it has never been denied that the city carriers should receive the slight and modest increase in salary for which efforts have been made during many years. It is generally believed that some improvement should be made in the conditions under which the rural carriers work. Many cities would be immensely benefited in their postal service if the pneumatic tube could be introduced for some purposes; but such things, as well as deserved increases in pay of clerks and of the railway mail clerks, are made impossible because the second-class mail matter of the present day absorbs all the resources of the Department.

Many of the improvements suggested must be made in the near future. If the revenues of the Department are not greatly increased then the improvements must be made without regard to the revenue produced by the service. That will necessitate the determination of the question, Does Congress intend that the postal service shall be self-sustaining, or is it intended that it shall be developed and improved regardless of its revenue-producing capacity?

There are good reasons for the policy followed so far—that is, for insisting that the service shall be on a self-sustaining basis. If it does not produce sufficient money to pay for its operations, the necessary money must be raised by some other form of taxation. Additional excises or duties must be levied in order to obtain the money to continue the postal service. The country to-day is sufficiently taxed without adding the $190,000,000 now required for the postal service to the sums collected through the prevalent methods of taxation.

The present method of taxing by the collection of postage is not burdensome, nor is it unfair. Everyone pays in proportion to the use had of the Department with the exception of those who burden the mails with the second-class matter. They obtain a service out of proportion to their payment in comparison with other patrons of the service. This inequality should be remedied. After it is, then there will be ample revenue to conduct the postal service in a proper and highly efficient manner. Adequate compensation will be possible for the various branches of the service, and needed improvements can be made without unduly taxing the great mass of the people.

I have pressed the bill introduced to correct what I believe to be evils of the service, and I am gratified to find that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has taken the matter up seriously. The provision inserted in this bill, I am informed, will give to the committee information without which it is impossible for it to act intelligently and justly. With the information that will be obtained it is believed that the committee will be in a position to suggest measures that will eliminate the known and conceded abuses in the second-class mail. As the information will be had before the end of the next session of Congress, it is hoped that it may be possible in that session to effect some reforms. Such being the situation, I wish to express my gratification that a step has been taken to correct the evils that exist, and I have taken this opportunity to make it clear to those interested in the bill introduced by me that the committee is alive to the abuses of which complaint is so generally made and that it desires to remove all just cause for complaint.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway mail service: One general superintendent, at $4,000; one assistant general superintendent, at $3,500; one chief clerk, office of general superintendent, at $2,000; one assistant chief clerk, office of general superintendent, at $1,800; eleven division superintendents, at $3,000 each; eleven assistant division superintendents, at $1,800 each; five assistant superintendents, at $1,800 each; nineteen assistant superintendents, at $1,600 each; one hundred and twenty-five chief clerks, at $1,600 each; two hundred and fifty-nine clerks, class 6, at not exceeding $1,500 each; one thousand two hundred and fifty clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,400 each; five hundred and twenty-eight clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; one thousand eight hundred and fifty clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; one thousand seven hundred and fifty clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,100 each; five thousand four hundred clerks, class 3, at not exceeding $1,000 each; two thousand one hundred and seventy clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $900 each; nine hundred and five clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $15,000,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his descretion, under such regulations as he may provide, allow a clerk who is sick leave of absence with pay, his duties to be performed without expense to the Government during the period for which he is granted leave, not exceeding thirty days in any fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "pay," in line 9, page 19, to and including the word "leave" in line 11.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss it?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment which I have just offered is to do simple justice to the clerks in the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What page is your amendment addressed to?

Mr. LEVER. Page 19, line 9, beginning at the word "is" and continuing through line 11 down to the word "not."

The provision in the bill which gives the railway mail clerk thirty days' sick leave, provided during his illness he keeps his work going without expense to the Government, is, it seems, an attempt upon the part of the Post-Office Committee to do justice by this class of Government employees. I confess that it is a poor attempt, and really means nothing. My amendment seeks to give him the usual sick leave with pay which is given to the departmental clerk in Washington. It is well known that these pampered pets in Washington not only have thirty days of sick leave, but thirty days of annual leave, with pay, during the year. I can see no good reason for making a favored class out of these departmental clerks, while discriminating against city and rural carriers and the railway mail clerks, whose hours of work are longer, whose duties are more exacting, whose responsibility is greater, and whose positions require an equal, if not greater, degree of intelligence. The pay for clerks in the service in Washington is out of all proportions to that accorded the classes above mentioned, and there is every reason why the Government should favor these rather than the clerks in this city. My amendment purposes in a small way to bring about an equality of governmental favor among the employees.

According to the report of the Postmaster-General, there are over 12,000 railway mail clerks doing arduous and hazardous service.

It takes a high order of ability to perform the duties of a railway mail clerk. It is necessary that he commit to memory ten or twelve thousand post-offices and the schedules of all railroads and junctional points through the States distributed by the lines upon which he is employed. Not only this, but he must keep track of the new railroads constantly being built, the ever-changing dispatch of mails, the old post-offices discontinued, the new ones established, and the distributing points of the thousands of rural delivery routes constantly being put into operation, and at the same time keep himself thoroughly posted on the postal laws and regulations.

These clerks are away from home a great part of the time, some all the time, except Sundays, and of course their expenses at home are going on at the same time with their expense of living on the road; and unlike other agents of the Government, post-office inspectors, rural agents, and the like, he must bear his own expenses while traveling.

It is well known to every student of economic conditions that the price of the necessaries of life—clothing, and food, and fuel—have steadily risen for the last ten years under the operation of our present tariff laws, but there has been no increase in the salaries allowed postal clerks. This is an injustice to the clerks to which the Government ought not to be a party.

When the soldier has become worn out in the service of his country, provision is made for taking care of him in declining age. Not so with the postal clerk, upon whose intelligence and integrity we are dependent for the prompt delivery of our mail. Even though his duties be more hazardous and dangerous than that of a soldier during actual hostilities, when he is worn out, like the faithful old horse in the hands of a cruel master, he is turned in the field to die.

The position of the postal clerk is the most dangerous of any of the postal service; it is more dangerous than that of the engineer or fireman on the train, who may see the peril in time to escape it, whereas the postal clerk, penned in the car and busy with his work, is unconscious of the danger until the awful crash comes. The deaths and injuries among postal clerks are startling, although the Department seems to be making every effort to minimize them. According to the report of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service for 1895, 64 mail clerks were killed during the period from 1902 to 1905, 381 seriously injured, and 1,434 slightly injured. We can gather a good idea of the dangerous nature of his employment by reference to the number of persons killed and injured in train accidents during a certain period. Accident Bulletin No. 17, issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission, puts the number of persons of all classes killed during the three months of July, August, and September of last year at 1,056, while 16,386 were injured, a total of killed and injured of 17,439, a number larger than the fighting force of Lee's army at Appomattox. These casualties came about in three months, and I presume the proportion was kept up during the year.

These 12,000 clerks, each day taking their lives in their own hands and doing the most exacting work in the Government service, receive an average salary of only $1,100 per annum, and the majority of them get far less than this. Who is there to stand up and say that this pitiful sum is a just compensation for the kind of work done? These salaries ought to be increased, and if I did not know that an amendment to that effect would be ruled out on a point of order I should offer it now. The best that I can do within the rule is to submit the amendment giving them thirty days' sick leave with pay. They ought to have, in addition to that, thirty days' annual leave with pay in order that they might be put on an equal footing with the favored few in Washington. I should offer that as an amendment, too, if I did not know it was subject to a point of order, which I am sure would be made, judging from the attitude of the chairman of the committee toward the amendment now under consideration.

Gentlemen of the committee, this amendment of mine, the only one that can be held in order, is the only means by which we can show our desire to do justice to this great and deserving class of Government employees. I appeal to you in their name and in the name of common justice and fairness to support it. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. The railway mail clerks, under existing law, get fifteen days' leave of absence with pay, where they are on duty fifty-two weeks in the year. The provision of this amendment would give a greater favor to this class of clerks than to any other class of postal employees in this country, because it would give them leave of absence in case of sickness for thirty days, which would be in addition to their regular leave of absence under existing law; and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that during the time that these men are off service, as you say they are, they are studying schedules?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I said they were entitled to a certain leave of absence with pay if they were on service fifty-two weeks in the year. I made no reference to the number of times they were off. They are entitled, if they serve fifty-two weeks in the year, to the fifteen days' leave, notwithstanding the custom of laying off a few days between runs.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Why should you allow the Department clerks in Washington thirty days' leave, and these men who do this large amount of business only fifteen days' leave and no sick leave at all? Will the gentleman answer that question? Why is it fair, and is it fair, if the gentleman knows, for the Government to allow these 12,000 clerks only fifteen days' leave, while we allow to the pampered pets of the Departments in Washington thirty days' leave and thirty days' sick leave?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not responsible, nor is the gentleman, for the favored class in Washington here. I am only speaking of this postal service.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman ought to be willing to correct that injustice.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move to strike out the last word. I want some information from the chairman of the committee. This leave is granted, sick leave with pay, and then immediately thereafter this language occurs: "His duties to be performed without expense to the Government."

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How can you do that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Under a former law a post-office clerk was privileged to arrange for a lower-grade clerk or substitute to peform the duties of the regular clerk and the substitute or lower-grade clerk received the regular pay of that class, while the clerk who was doing the duty received the grade of pay of his class, which would enable him to make the difference between the two. But under the arrangement of a recent statute and of a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury that practice was done away with. So that under existing conditions if a clerk of the regular grade is sick and unable to perform his duty he loses absolutely the pay of his grade during his absence on account of sickness. Under this provision he will be permitted to make an arrangement with a substitute or lower-grade clerk and pay him at the rate of the lower salary, which would enable him to save the difference between that pay and his regular pay during the period of his illness.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This in effect, then, does not give any sick leave at all?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Only with that limitation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Would you not be willing to strike out the limitation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would not be willing. I hope we may make progress, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 71.

Mr. POU. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been a Member of this body I believe I have always supported that item in the post-office supply bill known as the "appropriation for the maintenance of necessary and special mail facilities on trunk lines between Washington, Atlanta, and New Orleans," except when this item was considered in the Committee of the Whole two years ago. It was then repeatedly stated that the Government received little or no benefit from that item in the bill. Indeed, I think it was urged that mail was being delivered in Atlanta and New Orleans over roads which did not receive this appropriation practically as soon as the mail delivered by the fast train. I did not investigate the matter carefully, and I think I voted to strike out that item along with other items attacked in that debate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so much has been said about this appropriation that I have investigated it with some care and with a sincere purpose to ascertain what the facts are. What are the facts?

In the first place, this is not an appropriation made by Congress to the Southern Railroad, but, as I understand the evidence of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, the money goes to that railroad which makes the quickest schedule between Washington, Atlanta, and New Orleans, subject to the approval of the Government. Formerly the Coast Line had the contract to carry the fast mail, but voluntarily abandoned the contract because of the difficulty in making the schedule required by the Government. Therefore the Southern Railroad is carrying the fast mails on a train which carries nothing else except express, under a schedule approved by the Postmaster-General, for the reason that it makes a quicker schedule than any other road. Let me read this item in the bill:

> For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us stick to the facts. I find that Mr. Shallenberger, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in the hearing recently had by the Post-Office Committee, after stating that the fast train expedited the delivery of the mail about six hours, also used the following words, speaking of the service rendered:

> There are so many advantages that I would not be able to state just what they are. In a general way it tends to quicken all service and to expedite service on lateral lines that make connection with this particular train.

Now, is this true? So far as I know, this statement has not been challenged. Gentlemen from the State of Louisiana, Members of this House, tell me that this service puts mail in the city of New Orleans fully twelve hours sooner than mail is put there by any other train. Another Member of this body, a distinguished Representative from the State of Alabama, tells me that fully 2,000,000 people receive direct benefit from this appropriation, and probably as many more receive indirect benefit, while the entire mail service south of Washington is stimulated by this service. In other words, he calculates that 2,000,000 persons living immediately along the route get their mail very much sooner by having it delivered directly from this train, and that probably as many more not living directly on the route get their mail sooner by reason of the fact that they live on routes which receive mail delivered from this fast train.

Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly satisfied, not only that the Government gets value for this expenditure, but that millions of people living in the South are benefited by having their mail delivered sooner than it otherwise would be. Knowing the facts as they are admitted now upon all sides, I feel that I would be doing the people of my section an injustice if I were to vote to strike out this item, when every one of us knows that an item will be left in the bill appropriating nearly a million dollars for the maintenance of the pneumatic-tube service in our great cities, which only expedites the delivery of the mail in those cities a few minutes. Why are Representatives on this floor from the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, with few exceptions, asking for this appropriation? I think they are pretty good Democrats and patriotic men. Would they ask for a useless appropriation? Why are gentlemen from South Carolina, from my own State, from Virginia, supporting this appropriation? It seems to me if our colleagues on the committee are willing to give this fast service to the people of the South, if the service is putting the mail all through that section sooner than it otherwise would be delivered, as it undoubtedly does, we would be voting against the interest of our own people to deny it to them. Recently, Mr. Chairman, the Government has instituted a new system of mail delivery. About $28,000,000 will be appropriated this year to deliver mail to people living in the country. The installment of this system is delivering mail every morning, except Sunday, to millions of persons not living in the towns who, before the establishment of the service, only received their mail once or twice per week. Shall we stop the fast trains which puts the mail quickly at distributing points?

Now, Mr. Chairman, when we pass this bill we will vote away $191,000,000 of the people's money, and when the Assistant Postmaster-General tells us that all mail service in the South is expedited by this appropriation, when the amount is a mere pittance compared to the great sum carried by the bill, I repeat that I feel I would be doing the people of my section an injustice if, knowing the facts as I think I do, I voted to strike this item out.

In conclusion I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in any railroad under the sun. For nearly twenty years I have appeared against them in the courts, the Southern Railroad in particular. I do not accept their favors. I am under no obligations of any kind to any of them. I know I am doing what I think is right. I believe I am voting in the interest of the people of the great progressive South. Possibly the district I represent will not receive as much benefit from this fast mail as will other districts in my State; but, Mr. Chairman, if I only voted for measures which directly benefited the people of my district, I would, I think, be unworthy of a seat in this body. I hope I am broad enough to look beyond the lines which mark out my own district on the map. I will not impugn the motive of any gentleman, and I hope it is not necessary here or elsewhere for me to say anything in vindication of my own, and I will conclude by saying simply I am doing what I think is right. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman from North Carolina to say that the mail is expedited on all the lateral lines by this special-facility train?

Mr. POU. I do not say it, but Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger does.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I do not think so.

Mr. POU. I beg your pardon. I have read his exact words. I have them before me.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the assignment or transfer of clerks from the railway mail service, however, preference shall be given to the persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service who served in the civil war and who are now serving as clerks on the railway mail cars in order that they may be transferred to clerical service in the Department or in the post-offices and relieved from service on said cars as rapidly as practicable, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of the offices to which they may be transferred.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 25, after the word "transferred," insert the following: "Provided, That any rural free-delivery carrier who has served as such for three years, and whose record for efficiency is good, shall be eligible to transfer without examination to any other position in the classified service of the Government the salary of which does not exceed the salary of a rural free-delivery carrier of three years' service; and the list of such carriers on file at the Post-Office Department shall be deemed an eligible list from which the heads of Departments may select in filling vacancies in classified positions the salaries of which do not exceed $720 per annum; and those on this eligible list shall have preference over all others except honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I should like to say just a word about this amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, we must get ahead with the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For acting clerks, in place of clerks injured while on duty, and to enable the Postmaster-General to pay the sum of $1,000, which shall be exempt from the payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representatives of any railway postal clerk or substitute railway postal clerk who shall be killed while on duty or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury, $100,000.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following after the word "dollars," in line 15, page 20: "That from and after the passage of this act whenever a promotion shall be made of any clerk in the Department of the Post-Office, under rule 11, section 2, of the regulations of the Civil Service Commission, any clerk in said Department who, for good and sufficient ground, believes that he has failed in obtaining such promotion by reason of unfair or prejudiced reports as to his fitness for such promotion shall be hereby authorized to file with the Civil Service Commission a petition setting forth his grounds of complaint as to said promotion and excepting thereto.

"That upon the receipt of said petition by the Civil Service Commission it shall be their duty to investigate the statement made therein and to report their findings thereon to the Postmaster-General, and whenever the report of said Commission shall declare that a wrong to the petitioner or others has been done in making said promotion it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to declare the promotion complained of void and to have such promotion made in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission."

The CHAIRMAN. We have passed that point.

Mr. GILL. I was on my feet attempting to get the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, is there an opportunity to be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer not to hear the gentleman, because the Chair is perfectly clear on the subject.

Mr. GILL. I should like to be heard for a few minutes, and I believe under the rules of the House I have a right——

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman is in error on that. It is optional with the Chair whether he shall hear arguments on a point of order; but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GILL. I do not want to impose any duty on the Chair that does not properly belong to him. Is it in order for me to move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman can make that motion.

Mr. GILL. Then I make that motion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I understand the point of order has been ruled upon and that the gentleman now makes another motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman now moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to hear the statement of the chairman of the committee as to what his point of order is in regard to this proposition. I think that it can be met. I do not think this proposition is in violaton of any rule that I have yet been able to discover in the rules of this body. I frankly confess my unfamiliarity with these rules, but it seems to me that this proposition is so germane to the provisions in this bill that it is not possible to find a reasonable objection to exclude this amendment from the consideration of this committee.

The chairman of this committee has seen fit, in the consideration of this bill, Mr. Chairman, to endeavor to prevent this body from considering many propositions which have been suggested by way of amendment for the betterment of this bill. Now, I think it is due to this House and it is due to the Members making amendments to this bill that when the gentleman makes a point of order he should at least state to this body what his point of order is and in what respect he makes the point of order on this amendment. I assert, and can demonstrate it, I think, by the laws in existence, that this amendment has not added any new law to that now on the statute books. I assert that the only thing in this amendment that in any way might be criticised as not being within the rules is a provision which is directory of the manner in which the matter provided for by law is to be done by the Civil Service Commission. This provides that on petition the Civil Service Commissioners shall hear complaints made in the petition and render findings on facts presented to them, upon which the Postmaster-General shall act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that does not change the law; it does not change the rules of the Civil Service Commission, because, if you will read those rules, you will find that the Civil Service Commission under the law to-day has full power to hear complaints and render decisions thereon. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this distinction, a distinction which, in my judgment, exists at law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. GILL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. If the law permits a certain act on the part of an administrative officer and it is proposed to change that and make it mandatory, does not that change the statute?

Mr. GILL. I am coming to that point just now, and I am trying to illustrate it to the Chair in this way: At law there is a right; there is also a remedy. There is a clear distinction to everyone who has knowledge of law between the right and the remedy. Now, I suggest to the Chair that under the law as it stands to-day the power to hear complaints and render decisions thereon exists under the provisions of the law which enable the Civil Service Commission to act. I do not propose to change that power; in other words, I do not ask to do away with the right, but I suggest that the remedy or, in other words, the mode in which this power shall be exercised shall be directed by this body. I make this distinction, that while I am changing the manner of proceeding under the law, I am not changing the provisions of the law. It merely directs the Civil Service Commission to proceed under the provisions of the law in a certain course, by which relief can be given.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. GILL. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand the gentleman's contention to be that the scope of his amendment is simply a declaration of the law and not a change of the law?

Mr. GILL. That is it, except that it goes one step further and indicates the course that the Civil Service Commissioners are to take without changing a single line of the law. I drew this provision to make it conform absolutely to the law as it now exists, and not even to disturb the discretion of the Civil Service Commission. It reads at the end that it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, upon the report of the Civil Service Commission that a wrong has been done in making a promotion, to declare such promotion void and to have such promotion made in such manner as shall be determined by the Civil Service Commission. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. That being an authority that was not before granted to the Commissioners.

Mr. GILL. I understand it refers only to the manner. The law already has put a mandate on the Commission; the law already says that the Commission shall provide the manner and mode of promotion, and I simply offer a provision which changes the remedy under the law, but not the law itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman. The proposition is, the Chair understands, to direct the Commission as to the manner in which it shall carry out a law heretofore enacted, and therefore the Chair must maintain the position which he has taken heretofore and sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $940,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster-General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That $172,600 of the sum in this item appropriated is hereby made available for the purpose of covering the cost of mail service by underground electric cars in the city of Chicago, Ill., now under contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the point of order to that provision, beginning with the word "provided," on line 12, page 21, down to the word "railroads," at the end of line 24.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman please indicate again what line?

Mr. JOHNSON. Beginning with the word "provided," in line 12, page 21, and ending with the word "railroads," on the same page, line 24. My point of order, Mr. Chairman, is that this is distinctly legislation; but it may be wise legislation, and for that reason I desire to reserve the point of order and would like to hear from the committee.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's inquiry I will state that under section 3965 of the Revised Statutes, under the law passed June 8, 1872, the Postmaster-General "shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper." The regulations have grown up under which the electric car service in the cities has been used by the Department in carrying mails. Under the regulations affecting the contracts, which I think are clearly authorized by that statute, and it has been so held for a great many years, the practice of operating and granting to electric roads has been what is practically equivalent to 3 cents a mile for a year for that service. The allowance is $150 a year where the mileage is 2,000 or less. That means $150 a year for the entire service of the electric lines where the year's mileage is 2,000 or less.

Mr. JOHNSON. You mean 20 miles?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; I mean 2,000 miles of travel of the electric car. Where the mileage is more than 2,000 and not more than 3,500, $175 a year; more than 3,500 and not more than 5,000, $200 a year; more than 5,000 and not more than 8,333, $250 a year; more than 8,333 miles it is 3 cents per mile; but the other schedule which I have read practically means 3 cents a mile for the annual rate of the electric car or cable car service. They use these cars sometimes for pouch service, laying a pouch of mail on the vestibule of the car, and the motorman puts it off at its proper destination. In other instances they utilize the regular equipped electric postal car furnished by the company which makes the contract with the Government. But there is a difference in the pouch mail and the regular postal car or electric car service. It is the cheapest service, Mr. Chairman, in the postal system—cheaper than the wagon service in our cities. Now, this provision in the bill here recommended simply authorizes the Postmaster-General, where it is found that by reason of the large quantity of this mail handled upon electric lines, or where the exchange points are very numerous, those two things concurring, there may be permitted an increase not to exceed an increase which will be equivalent to 4 cents a mile instead of 3 cents a mile for the annual rate.

Even with that authorization it does not bring the cost of the electric and cable car service as high as the cost of the screen-wagon service. It will still remain as the cheapest service in the country in the mail service. In a number of cities in the country the cable and electric car service has been actually discontinued by reason of the refusal of companies to longer contract at so low a compensation, and the committee was informed in the hearings that especially in the city of St. Louis, and possibly Boston and New York—I do not now remember exactly, but certainly more cities than the one named—notices have already been served of the discontinuance of that service on the 30th of next June unless some provision in line with what is here provided shall be made. To change this system and do away entirely with the utilization of these electric and cable car lines, to compel the whole service to be again based upon the screen-wagon service, would not only impair the service by reason of great delays in the delivery of the mail, but would, in my judgment and the judgment of the committee and the judgment of the Department, result in increased expense. I think the gentleman will appreciate that under these conditions it is very wise legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the difference in the method of compensation where they use an exclusive mail car, and where they use what is called the "closed pouches?"

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will read from the provision itself. "Closed-pouch service not performed in independent and trailer cars, or apartments thereof, not exceeding full rates, namely, at the rate of," and so on, as I gave them, $150 a year where the mileage is less than 2,000 miles, etc. The difference, in a word, is simply this: The schedule which I read a moment ago, where the mileage is not in excess of 2,000 miles, 3 cents a mile for pouch service; where they use trailer or apartment cars—a regularly equipped postal car—is now at the rate of three-quarters of 1 cent per mile. This provision permits, under certain conditions—where concurrently the increased number of exchange points become numerous and the quantity of mails large—with these two concurrent conditions, the Postmaster-General may permit it to be 1 cent a mile instead of three-fourths of 1 cent a mile.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is one thing I do not understand. I had not read the mileage pay. Does each electric-car company earn according to the amount of mail they carry? Is there a requirement as to the amount of mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They carry all the mail the Government delivers to these cars. It does not matter whether it is large or small.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, an electric railway running out from Indianapolis, say; if it should carry one pouch to a post-office 7 miles out, do you mean to say that they would give it that pay then?

Mr. OVERSTREET. This is service between depots and post-offices and between post-offices and stations of the same office.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not include transportation of a small quantity of mail for 5 miles out in the country.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Only where the station of the post-office is that distance from the office. This electric-car service is limited practically, as I understand, to operation between depots and post-offices in all large cities and the post-office and the stations in suburban points of those cities. I do not remember how many cities of the Union have this system, but it is a very limited number—about 146, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, to antagonize the provision, but as it was legislation I wanted some reason given to the House for it. As far as I am concerned, I am satisfied, and I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the chairman of the committee on the proposition that the service rendered the Post-Office Department by the street railway companies is the cheapest service that Department receives. The Post-Office Department and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are behind the times in the use they are making of the street cars of the country to carry the mails. I make these remarks now, Mr. Chairman, because they are prompted by a knowledge of actual conditions existing which ought to be remedied by the Post-Office Department and the committee.

I cite you, Mr. Chairman, one instance which is within my personal knowledge and within my district. Some 5 miles out from the city of Omaha there is a growing and thriving town called "Benson," with hundreds of people actively engaged in business life. They have there to-day a star-route system between Omaha and Benson, with a wagon service twice a day. It takes an hour each way. The electric street cars, without transfer, pass within two blocks of the Omaha post-office and pass the door of the Benson post-office, and make the distance in half the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state whether the post-office authorities have endeavored to make terms with the electric railway company for the carriage of the mail on that particular line?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I will come to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. And if not, what reasons prevented its establishment?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. If you will let me finish my statement, I will try to answer any question you may ask. For that inadequate, antiquated star-route service the Government of the United States pays $550 a year, and under the law, under the rules of the Post-Office Department, under the law being passed by this Congress, under the rules of this committee, the street railway company can receive only $250 a year, or $300 less than the law gives to that antiquated service which the people are now receiving. Mr. Chairman, the street railway company declines to accept the mails for what the Government is willing to pay. The company considers that it is imposed upon enough in carrying the mails from Omaha to South Omaha for 3 cents a mile and serving that city of 40,000 people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the instance that you cite of the car company carrying the mails from Omaha to South Omaha, will you state whether it is carried in bulk or whether it is carried in separate cars or in compartment cars?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. It is carried in closed pouches in regular cars, and the company receives for that South Omaha service less than $1,400 a year—less than $4 a day. It is a disgrace to this Government and to this Congress that we do not remedy that situation. Mr. Chairman, I have no special interest in the street railway company, but I have an interest in the city of South Omaha, that is liable at any time to be deprived of this service. I have an interest in the people of Benson, who are clamoring for modern service and can not get it.

Mr. Chairman, under the rule laid down by the Post-Office Department and by Congress, if the street-railway company would accept the contract on the terms offered by the Department, we could have three services per day between Omaha and Benson, each trip taking only half the time it now takes, and yet the company would receive only $365 for such service; whereas for two trips per day of the antiquated star-route service the Government pays $550.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what, in his opinion, is a reasonable compensation that should be paid to these electric cars for the carriage of the mails?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent for an extension. If I do not get it, I will move to strike out another word from another paragraph and get it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for how long?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I take it, from the report of the Post-Office Committee, of which the gentleman is a member, that in those cities which come within the provisions of the increase provided for the one-third increase is reasonable and right. The committee did not go far enough when it extended this provision only to the city of St. Louis and other favored cities. They were dealing unfairly with cities like Omaha and South Omaha and the town of Benson. Benson is only typical of numerous other suburban towns all over the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. In confirmation of what the gentleman has said, I know a case of a town situated about a mile and a quarter from the depot, on an electric car line service. Under the law, to carry that mail on the electric line, which everybody wants, the total compensation would be less than $300. The Government has been for a long time and is now paying $750 for it, and the street-car company would gladly carry it for $500.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I was about to make the point that one more cent per mile, which has been added by the committee in certain cities, is certainly within reasonable limits.

My judgment is that 5 cents per mile would be reasonable, because it makes no difference whether the car carries one pouch or three pouches or six pouches. There is no extra compensation by reason of the increased number.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to this matter at this time, only by way of formal amendment, because I know enough about the proceedings of this House to know that no material amendment would carry against the objection of the committee; but I want to register my protest now against antiquated methods in the Post-Office Department or any other Department, and to say that the Government service is behind the popular demand and behind modern methods of private business enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not seeking to criticise this committee as individuals; I am not seeking to criticise the Post-Office Department in any unfair way. I consider that these defects are so many barnacles that have fastened themselves upon the postal system, and we have got to waken up in order to shake them off.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman refer to the Post-Office Committee of the House or to the Department as barnacles?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Neither.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman's language indicated one or both.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I am referring to methods, and not to men. I am criticising no individual, but I stand here to say now that I will never let the subject rest, if I am sent back here, until the condition complained of is remedied. I propose that out in the West, where we have progressive cities and progressive people, the Department and Congress shall recognize us and apply progressive methods to the public business. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 5 to 11, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the paragraph just read.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHEN. Mr. Chairman, one week ago to-day I discussed this proposition at some length. I have voted against this item for nine years. I have lately investigated it fully. I came to the conclusion that the arguments against this item are supported by more facts than ever before,

The railroads are receiving, under the usual statutory compensation, over $50,000 more this year for carrying the mail over the routes from here to Charlotte than they received during the last fiscal year. I undertook to establish certain propositions here the other day, and I believe I established them beyond contradiction. I undertook to show that the language of this section which is apparently discretionary is held by the Post-Office Department to be mandatory. Only one gentleman has disputed that proposition. The others, I am glad to say, have consented to it. I undertook to show that this special mail train, as they call it, which is really a mail and express train to Atlanta and a passenger, mail, and express train from Atlanta to New Orleans, is not the creature of subsidy, but the result of the great development and growth of the traffic along this line. I believe that fact stands established. I undertook to show that this money is paid not to enable the railroad companies to run trains Nos. 97 and 37, but to induce the companies to run them on the schedule time which the railroads themselves have fixed. I believe that proposition is not disputed.

Further than that I undertook to show, and it stands uncontradicted to this minute, although there has been prepared and delivered two set speeches in opposition to my position, that this line of railroad gets more pay per mile for carrying the mail under the regular pay than any other railroad in the United States south of the Ohio and Potomac, and west of the Missouri River. I showed beyond a doubt that the Southern, from here to Danville, under the statute gets more pay than is paid on any other route in the United States, except fifteen, and that every one of those, except three, has many more trips per week than this one.

More than that, I showed beyond a doubt that this very train—No. 97—from here to Charlotte, earns every day of the year, exclusive of the subsidy, over and above expenses $500 net money from mail and express, and I showed that its net profits exceed 200 per cent, exclusive of the subsidy. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] said, "Why didn't you go with the train beyond Charlotte?" If I had gone to Atlanta I would have shown that instead of $182,000 it made $260,000 clear profit annually, exclusive of the subsidy. I showed all these facts, and the able gentlemen that followed me have not disputed the facts—not one. Not a single road in the United States receives one cent of subsidy, except the line from here to New Orleans and the short one from Kansas City to Newton.

Again, it has never been the theory of any government to subsidize any corporation or any enterprise unless it was one that otherwise was unprofitable. I showed in this case that this line of road and these very trains that you propose to subsidize are greatly profitable, and yet gentlemen support the subsidy. My distinguished colleague from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] says: "What have the earnings to do with it?" He denies that the profitableness of this train or road has anything to do with it. Whenever, Mr. Chairman, you contend that the profits of the road, and the profits of the particular trains subsidized have nothing to do with it, what proposition do you then declare? You then——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If gentlemen will permit me, by unanimous consent, to make a statement. This particular subject and the very next paragraph in the bill have been discussed at great length in general debate, the gentleman himself having made a speech of more than an hour.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. We could not vote on it that day.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understand; but it was the gentleman's election to speak then, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that this is the time to determine whether we are to run loosely for a number of hours by unanimous consent or to reach some kind of an understanding in regard to a limitation of debate. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] if he contemplates making an argument upon his motion to strike out?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I move now, Mr. Chairman, that debate upon this section continue for forty minutes, twenty minutes to a side.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will ask the gentleman to make that thirty minutes and let the Chair control the time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. To make it an hour, thirty minutes on a side, and let the Chair control the time?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; I mean thirty minutes altogether, fifteen minutes to a side, including the five minutes given the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not cut off gentlemen in this way.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not cutting them off.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire thirty minutes to a side?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not thirty minutes to a side, but altogether.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I suggested twenty minutes to a side.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Counting the five minutes already occupied that will be twenty minutes to a side.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There are a number of gentlemen on the other side who are opposed to this measure.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We are ready for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman would let this debate run for a little while.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When speeches were made on this subject there were very few Members in the House, and now there are more than a hundred here.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I propose we go at once to a vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FINLEY. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of gentlemen who are interested here, some on one side and some on another, who wish to make a few remarks, and I have not spoken on this question at all for one. I have not mentioned this matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like very much to conclude this bill to-night.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee we are willing to go at once to a vote on his motion. I suggest that all debate upon this paragraph and the next shall be concluded in forty minutes, and all amendments to them, the time to be equally divided and in the control of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That would mean thirty-five minutes from now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I was saying that the announcement of the doctrine that the profitableness of the trains subsidized has nothing to do with this question is tantamount to a declaration to the people of this country that this House should never cease these subsidies until the railroad companies themselves say that they no longer desire them in order to adequately serve the people of the great South. My friend from Alabama recognized the strength of my position, and he undertook to show that these trains were not so profitable, and how did my friend proceed? He said he had much information about the express matter that is carried on No. 97, but he did not state the amount of it. I could not find what amount of express matter was carried, except that it carried one loaded car, although I made due inquiry from the express company and from the railroad company.

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman is attempting to quote me——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will give the exact quotation in my speech if you will indicate it to me. I will do you entire justice.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. For a question.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman said I said in my speech that the profitableness of the mail service under the general railway mail pay had nothing to do with the appropriation for these special facilities. What I did say was this, that the Post-Office Department had no right, and did not attempt to exercise the right to control the mail schedules under the general laws governing the railway mail pay, and therefore the only opportunity we had to maintain this fast service was by these special facilities, and if we did not have them otherwise it would not be maintained.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Here is what the gentleman said:

> It has been urged that the Southern Railway enjoys large gross and net earnings. I shall not detain the House to state the financial conditions of this company. This information can be obtained from a number of reputable sources. But it is pertinent to ask, How does this affect the question at issue?

I regretted that my colleague made the unjust, because untrue, intimation that opposition to this appropriation was because of hostility to the Southern Railroad. I do not believe the gentleman would have deemed that statement necessary if he could have answered the argument I made or disputed the facts which I submitted.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman misquotes me. I said that it was strange that gentlemen selected the Southern Railroad and said nothing about any other railroad.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman will remember I stated the reason for that was on account of the fact that the Southern Railroad is the chief beneficiary of this appropriation. I stated the reasons fully in my speech, and the gentleman must have understood me. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] in his estimates mixed the freight earnings and the passenger earnings. The freight earnings were about $1.90 per train mile last year on the Southern and the passenger earnings less than 99 cents, while the Southern Railroad gets pay, exclusive of the subsidy, from here to Charlotte, amounting to $1.91 per train mile for train No. 97.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of another thing. I believe my colleague said that he favored the subsidy not because the railroad gets the benefit of it, but solely for the people's benefit. The gentleman from Alabama said the railroad desired it because it was an advertisement for that great system; that it associated it with the powers and privileges of this great Government. I want to ask the gentleman, my colleague, a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, why he did not endeavor to get a similar subsidy, if he favors it for the good of the people, to the Seaboard Air Line and the Coast Line, to induce them to give improved mail facilities to the people on those lines, for they have not as good facilities as the people living along the Southern Railroad would have even if the two subsidized trains should be taken off? [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the subsidy that has for many years past been paid to the Southern Railway in the way of additional compensation for carrying the mail between Washington and New Orleans is unnecessary, and does not in any general sense expedite the mail. Trains Nos. 97 and 37 are the two subsidized trains; that is, the $142,000 given by the Government in the way of a bounty or subsidy to the Southern Railroad is divided between these two trains. No. 97, one of the subsidized trains, makes the run between Washington and Charlotte, N. C., in nine hours and twenty minutes. No. 31, a high-class passenger train on the Southern Railroad during the past winter, made the run between Washington and Charlotte, in nine hours and thirty-eight minutes. No. 37, one of the subsidized trains, makes the run from Washington to Charlotte in ten hours and forty minutes. No. 33, which is not a subsidized train, makes the time between Washington and Charlotte in ten hours and forty minutes. No. 97, in the run from Washington to Charlotte, 380 miles, made only eighteen minutes quicker time than No. 31. No. 37, which is a subsidized train, makes the identical time that is made by No. 33, which time is one hour and two minutes slower than made by No. 31, an unsubsidized train. The Southern Railway is amply paid for carrying the mails between Washington and New Orleans.
